In an action to quiet title, defendant alleged that on November 20, 1879, W. was owner of the land, and on that day he received from W. a conveyance thereof. Plaintiff's evidence showed that in October, 1878, he recovered a judgment against W., and on the execution thereof he purchased the land in October, 1880, receiving a sheriff's deed in October, 1881. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court granted a nonsuit. Held, that the nonsuit was erroneous, as plaintiff's admission, by claiming under him, that W. had been owner of the land as alleged in the answer, was not an admission that W.'s conveyance to defendant antedated the sheriff's sale.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to land. The complaint is in the usual form, praying that defendant be required to set forth the nature of his adverse claim, etc. Defendant's answer admits that he claims the land adversely to the plaintiff, and avers "that on or about the 20th day of November, 1879, for a good, valuable consideration, a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the whole of said described premises was duly executed and delivered to him by one Miner Walden, in whom the legal title to the whole of said described premises was then vested, and who was then in the open and notorious possession of said described premises, and the whole thereof, as the legal and lawful owner thereof, which said deed was sufficient in form and recitals to vest, and it did vest, the title in fee simple of said premises in this defendant." That said deed was duly recorded on the 6th day of January, 1880, and under it defendant entered into possession on November 20, 1879, and has ever since remained in exclusive possession, claiming absolute ownership of the premises. At the trial, plaintiff claimed title from the same Miner Walden by a sheriff's sale made by virtue of a writ of execution on a money judgment in a justice's court in his favor, against Walden, rendered October 12, 1878. The execution on which the premises were sold was issued October 1, 1880. The property was sold October 30, 1880, and the sheriff's deed to plaintiff was executed May 10, 1881. For the purpose of proving that his title acquired by this deed antedated the alleged deed from Walden to defendant of November 20, 1879, the plaintiff proved the regular issuance of a writ of attachment from the justice's court on October 2, 1878; and, to prove that this writ had been levied on the property in question, introduced the constable's return indorsed thereon, certifying that the constable had received the writ on the 2d day of October, 1878, "and served the same on the same day by attaching the following described real estate, [describing the land in question,] and filing a notice thereof with the county recorder of said county, and delivering a copy of said attachment to B. B. Garner, an occupant of said real estate." Plaintiff then proved that a copy of the writ, with the following notice attached thereto, had been filed in the recorder's office October 2, 1878: "Notice is hereby given that by virtue of the annexed writ of attachment issued in the above-entitled action, the following described real estate is attached as the property of the said Miner Walden, defendant, to wit:" (Here follows description of the property as in the return.) Then to prove that a similar notice, with a description of the property, had been served on the occupant of the land as required by section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff called the constable, who testified substantially the same as he had testified on a former trial of the same case. His testimony on the former trial is stated in the opinion of this court on a former appeal, (Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 470, 22 Pac. Rep. 284,) where it was held that his testimony was insufficient to prove the requisite notice to the occupant, and consequently that no valid levy of the attachment had been proved. Upon the foregoing evidence the plaintiff rested, and the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 1183, gives mechanics and others a lien for labor performed and materials furnished in the construction, etc., of any building, etc., but provides that the contract must be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid exceeds $1,000, and must be filed with the county recorder; otherwise it shall be void.

[2] Code Civil Proc. § 1191, provides that "any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, has a lien upon such lot for his work done and materials furnished."

As contended by counsel for the appellant, I think the court erred in sustaining the motion for nonsuit. Both parties claimed title from Walden. That Walden was the owner of the property on the 20th day of November, 1879, and that defendant claimed title from him by deed of that date, are distinctly averred in defendant's answer. The complaint does not show the source of plaintiff's alleged title, but on the trial plaintiff proved a sheriff's sale of the land to him, authorized by an execution in due form, issued to him by the justice of the peace on a valid judgment; a certificate of which sale in due form, reciting a levy of the execution, was issued to plaintiff, and a duplicate thereof duly filed in the recorder's office, October 30, 1880. Also the execution of a sheriff's deed in due form, reciting the judgment, the execution and levy thereof, the sale after due notice, and the certificate of sale. This made a prima facie case for the plaintiff, independently of any lien by attachment, subject, however, to be overcome by proof on the part of the defendant that Walden had conveyed to him on November 20, 1879, as alleged in his answer, or at any time prior to the sheriff's sale to plaintiff. Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 649; Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 5; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 564, 4 Pac. Rep. 473, and 8 Pac. Rep. 46. The admission by plaintiff that Walden had been the owner, as alleged in the answer, by claiming title under him, was not an admission that Walden had conveyed to defendant as alleged in the answer, at any time prior to the sheriff's sale to plaintiff. The averment in the answer that Walden had conveyed to defendant was denied by implication of law; and after plaintiff had made a prima facie case, by proving a conveyance from Walden to himself, the burden of proving a prior conveyance from Walden to defendant was on the defendant, since he was not at liberty to dispute the positive averment in his answer that Walden owned the land on November 20, 1879. People v. Railroad Co., 49 Cal. 420; Bigelow, Estop. pp. 687-690. As before remarked, the testimony of the constable as to what he did to effect the alleged attachment was substantially the same as on the former trial; and as on the former appeal that testimony was held to be insufficient to prove notice of the attachment to the occupant of the land, it was conclusively insufficient on the second trial. In that respect the decision on the former appeal had become the law of the case, and the trial court correctly so considered it on the second trial. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; FOOTE, C.

NATOMA WATER & MIN. CO. v. HANCOCK et al. (No. 14,847.)[1]

interest in the dam, the pond formed by it, and the land under the pond, and defendants were properly enjoined from extending a canal into the pond, even though their intention was to take only the surplus water after plaintiff's canal had taken its supply.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action by the Natoma Water & Mining Company against John Hancock and Joseph Wild to restrain them from diverting the water from the South Fork of the American river at a point on the stream where plaintiff had built and was maintaining a dam. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter and Solon Hall, for appellants. Daniel Titus, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to restrain defendants from diverting water from a stream called the "South Fork of the American River," at and from a certain dam of plaintiff on said stream. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The main facts in the case are these: In 1851 plaintiff located a dam and canal,—the dam to be at a point on said South Fork at a place called "Rocky Bar," and the canal to run to various localities to carry water for mining and agricultural purposes. In 1852 and 1853 the dam and canal were completed. The structure of the dam was at first made of wood, but in 1868 it was rebuilt of stone. The canal was of quite large dimensions and about 18 or 20 miles long, and during the later months of the dry seasons carried all the water of the stream. At other times there was a surplus of water, which ran over the crest of the dam. The water was backed up behind the crest of the dam so as to make a pool or pond. The dam and canal have been in this condition ever since 1853, and have been since then continuously used by plaintiff for beneficial purposes,—for carrying water for sale to miners and agriculturists and for irrigating vineyards and orchards owned by plaintiff. On March 27, 1854, the plaintiff by a written instrument granted to an association of persons, called the Boyd's Bar Water Company, "the right, privilege, and emblement to put in, insert, and maintain in the dam of said Natoma Water & Mining Company * * * a box of sufficient size, width, and depth to draw water sufficient to fill and supply the ditch, flume, and race of said Boyd's Bar Water Company, at, in, and with its present dimensions, say of two feet square." This instrument also provided that the plaintiff should not be obliged to maintain the said dam; and, further, that if there should occur any deficiency of water to plaintiff's canal, the plaintiff should have the right to close the gate supplying the Boyd's Bar ditch, and keep it closed while the deficiency continued. (In this instrument the word "dam" is evidently used, not in the strict sense of a structure across a water course, but in the sense frequently given the word, which includes the pool or pond created by the structure.) Immediately after the execution of this instrument, in 1854, the Boyd's Bar Company under said instrument "put into" the northerly side of the pool of plaintiff's dam, at a certain place, a certain box, through which the owners of the Boyd's Bar ditch have ever since been accustomed to take water to fill said ditch. And there seems to have been no difficulty about the right to take water under said instrument through said box placed in the side of the dam as aforesaid. Once or twice the plaintiff closed the gate, without objection. In 1883 the defendant Hancock became the owner of said Boyd's Bar Company's ditch and its rights under said instrument. This ditch is also sometimes called the "Clarke & Eastman Ditch." There is some contention as to that part of the judgment which deals with the Boyd's Bar ditch, and the amount of water to which it is entitled, and that part of the judgment will be hereafter noticed. But the most important contention in the case relates to a new right asserted by defendants, apart from and beyond the right accruing through said Boyd's Bar ditch. In 1887 the defendant Hancock posted a notice at plaintiff's dam to the effect that he intended to widen his ditch, so that it would carry 2,000 inches of water; that he claimed that much of the water of said South Fork, and that he intended to divert it "from said Natoma dam on the west side of the river." (The canal of plaintiff takes its water from the opposite side of the river, which is sometimes called the "south side" and sometimes the "east side.") Under said notice defendants commenced to enlarge said ditch and to construct additions to it, and at the commencement of this action a new piece of ditch was being constructed by them near the dam, and had reached within about 75 feet of plaintiff's said pond or pool. Shortly afterwards this piece of ditch, which partly consisted of a tunnel through granite rock, had reached to within 10 feet of the water of plaintiff's dam, leaving between the ditch and the water only a few feet of earth, which could have been removed by a few hours' work. This ditch, if permitted to be completed, would tap the water unrestrained by the dam at a point about 40 feet above the crest of the dam, and 10 inches lower than the bottom of plaintiff's canal on the other side of the stream. The result would be that defendants' ditch would drain the water raised by the dam so as to take it nearly all from plaintiff's canal. The judgment restrains defendants from thus completing their ditch, and running it into the backwater of plaintiff's dam.

Appellants say that they intended only to appropriate the surplus waters of the stream after plaintiff's canal had taken its supply, although their notice does not state such intention; and they invoke the rule that surplus water may be appropriated. There is no doubt that surplus water may be appropriated; and the quotation in appellants' brief from section 83 of Pomeroy on Riparian Rights correctly states the rule on the subject. But the author says in that section that such appropriation of surplus water may be made, "if no interference with the rights of the prior appropriator is thereby caused." But have appellants the legal right to tap the head of water created by respondent's dam, to inaugurate a perpetual trespass upon respondent's property, to practically take control of that over which respondent has exercised complete dominion and control for nearly 40 years, and to take possession of that which respondent has possessed during that period of time? The principles upon which property rights on the public lands of the United States in California were acquired, before government surveys and sales, have long been settled; the main rule being that a prior appropriation gives title. "Legislation and decisions have been uniform in awarding peaceable enjoyment to the first occupant either of the land or of anything incident to the land." Tartar v. Mining Co., 5 Cal. 398. Such appropriation was effected either by taking actual possession,—possessio pedis,—or by doing such acts as, considered with reference to the nature of the right to be acquired, were, in good sense and according to established customs, equivalent to actual possession. Water was appropriated by constructing ditches and turning water into them by means, generally, of dams erected across water courses; rights to the future diversion of the water, pending the completion of the ditches, being preserved by notices of intention to divert. Under this system properties of immense values were created in ditches, canals, and dams; and congress, by the act of July 26, 1866, enacted that such properties should be maintained and protected. This act was held by the United States supreme court in Broder v. Water Co., (respondent in the case at bar,) 101 U. S. 274, to be a mere "recognition of the pre-existing right of possession;" and it is clear that respondent's pre-existing right of possession embraced its dam, and the head and elevation of water created by it, and the pond and pool behind it, and the land perpetually covered and occupied by the water, as fully and effectually as it did any other part of its canal property. The dam, including the land which is necessarily covered with water in order to be of any beneficial use, the water head, and the pool or pond with its lateral approaches and supports, was an integral part of the canal itself. Indeed, as stated in Hutchinson v. Railroad Co., 37 Wis. 604, although the strict meaning of the word "dam" is a barrier built across a water course to confine and keep back flowing water, yet it is frequently used to designate all that results from the barrier. It was said in that case: "So we sometimes hear of fishing or bathing in a dam; and often of water in a dam,—meaning in the pond. So a pond is made to include the dam, even in judicial phrase. Jackson v. Virmelyea, 6 Cow. 677. And the grant of a dam is held to include an easement in the pond. Maddox v. Goddard, 15 Me. 218." But, by whatever name it may be called, respondent obtained a possessory right and title to the land which it appropriated and permanently occupied by means of its dam, and acquired the right to maintain the pond or pool and head of water above the barrier which it built across the stream; and this title was as perfect as any other title to a part of the public domain acquired by appropriation for any other legitimate purposes. It was expressly held in Rupley v. Welch, 23 Cal. 453, "the construction of a reservoir across the bed of a ravine for the purpose of collecting the water flowing down the same, to be used in irrigating a garden or fruit trees, gives to the party constructing the same a vested right of property in the reservoir." (Of course, in all such appropriations—even of mining claims—there had to be a reasonableness as to the amount or extent of the appropriation; but no such question arises in the case at bar.) According to the foregoing views the court below was right in enjoining appellants from running their ditch into respondent's pool, and into and upon the land possessed by respondent by means of its dam and pool. An injunction always lies to restrain threatened permanent interference with water rights. Ang. Water Courses, § 444 et seq.; California cases cited in Gear's Index Digest, at foot of page 426. "The interposition of a court of equity was required to prevent defendant's wrongful acts from ripening into a right, and on that ground alone the interference of a court of equity was properly asked and granted." Moore v. Waterworks Co., 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816; Mott v. Ewing, 90 Cal. 231, 27 Pac. Rep. 194. Moreover, whenever there is a threat and intent to wrongfully enter upon another's real property, and to take permanent possession thereof, and effect a permanent lodgment there, the threatened injury is "irreparable in itself," and the insolvency of the intruder or the actual damage which may ensue is immaterial. More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 595; Richards v. Dower, 64 Cal. 62, 28 Pac. Rep. 113; Lighter Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 290, 19 Pac. Rep. 426. Again, the threatened acts of appellants would be in the nature of waste, would destroy the very susbtance of respondent's estate, and would create a perpetual nuisance; and against such acts injunction is the proper remedy. Such acts would not constitute mere fugitive and temporary trespasses, but a trespass of a continuing nature, whose constant recurrence would render a remedy at law entirely inadequate.

With respect to respondent's rights under the Boyd's Bar contract, we think that they are sufficiently preserved by the judgment. The judgment decrees that "defendants may take sufficient water from plaintiff's said dam to supply a ditch two feet wide and two feet deep with the grade of the ditch known in 1854 as the 'Boyd's Bar Ditch;'" and we do not think that the specification of the box (and its location) through which the water is to be taken is any abridgment of the right. The water is to be taken substantially in the manner in which it has always been taken since 1854. It is contended that respondent's canal has been enlarged since the date of the contract, and that therefore respondent should not now have the right to close the Boyd's Bar ditch when the canal is not supplied. But the court does not find that the carrying capacity of the canal has been increased. In 1862 and 1864 the respondent cleaned out the canal, and reconstructed some portions of it by substituting earthwork for wooden flumes; and the court merely finds that in "some places" it was made wider, and that at those places the capacity was increased, but to what extent the evidence does not show. The evidence does not show an increase of the capacity of the whole ditch, and it is not likely that if there had been any substantial increase the owners of the Boyd's Bar ditch would have acquiesced therein for nearly 30 years. Indeed, there is not and has never been any serious trouble between the parties growing out of the Boyd's Bar contract; the real contest is about the new right asserted by appellants. The doctrine that the point of diversion of water may be changed, is, of course, subject to the condition that the change must not interfere with the rights of other parties. With respect to the minor points in the case, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the findings are sustained by the evidence, and that the findings are full enough to determine the material rights of the parties. We see no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: De Haven, J.; Sharpstein, J.

PRIOR v. DIGGS. (No. 14,874.)

SALE OF GOOD WILL — ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. Defendant sold to plaintiff the good will of his "saddlery, harness, and carriage trimming business," and agreed not to enter a like business in the same place while plaintiff, or any one deriving title to the good will from him, was engaged in such business. Later he engaged in a general merchandise business in that place, and, among other things, sold horse blankets, buggy robes and dusters, whips, and collar pads. Held, in an action for breach of contract, that evidence showing that such articles did not belong to the saddlery and harness business, but were articles of general merchandise, was admissible to prove there was no breach of contract.

2. Where a witness states that he "does not consider" or "does not think," etc., such expressions are not expressions of opinion, merely, as witnesses are not required to give their testimony with absolute positiveness.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county: C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Action by T. M. Prior against Marshall Diggs for breach of contract. Judgment for defendant. From the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Ball, for appellant. F. E. Baker and Clark & Aram, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action on November 24, 1888, to recover damages in the sum of $2,000 for the alleged breach of a written contract, which reads as follows: "Whereas, I, Marshall Diggs, of the county of Yolo, state of California, have this day sold to T. M. Prior, of the same place, the good will of the saddlery, harness, and carriage trimming business lately carried on by me in the town of Woodland, in said county, now, therefore, in consideration of said sale and of the sum of two hundred and twenty five dollars, gold coin of the United States, to me in hand paid by the said T. M. Prior, I hereby covenant and agree to and with the said T. M. Prior that, so long as the said T. M. Prior, or any person deriving title to the good will of said business from him, shall carry on a like business within said town, I will not, directly or indirectly, either for myself or as the agent or employe of any other person, carry on, or aid in carrying on, at any place within said town of Woodland, the business of saddlery, harness making, or carriage trimming, or the selling of saddles, harness, carriage trimmings, or other articles usually sold, or which I have been accustomed to sell, in connection with said business, or any other business usually carried on in connection therewith or subsidiary thereto. And whereas, from the nature of the case, it would be extremely difficult to fix the actual damage arising from a breach of this contract, now, therefore, it is hereby agreed that the sum of two thousand dollars shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach of this contract, and the said amount is hereby fixed and agreed upon as liquidated damages for such breach. Witness my hand this 17th day of January, A. D. 1883. M. DIGGS."

By his answer the defendant denied all the averments of the complaint, and set up numerous defenses. The case was tried before a jury, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and has appealed from the judgment and order. The Civil Code provides that "the good will of a business is the expectation of continued public patronage," (section 992,) and that "the good will of a business is property, transferable like any other," (section 993.) It also provides that "every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind is to that extent void," (section 1673,) except that "one who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or a part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein." Section 1674. Here the good will sold was only that "of the saddlery, harness, and carriage trimming business," and the question is, did the defendant violate his contract by thereafter carrying on "a similar business" while the plaintiff was carrying on "a like business?"

The facts proved, and bearing on this question, are, in substance, as follows: Prior to his sale to the plaintiff, defendant had been engaged in the saddlery, harness, and carriage trimming business for about a year, and, among other things, had kept and sold to his customers "horse blankets, buggy robes and dusters, whips, and collar pads.' In June, 1883, he bought in with Freeman & Co. as a partner in a general merchandise store, situated upon the same street and within a few feet from the place where the saddlery business which he had sold to the plaintiff was then being carried on. He remained in business as a member of the firm of Freeman & Co. until October, 1884, when he bought out his partners, and afterwards conducted the business at the same place in his own name. His business was principally the sale of hardware, agricultural implements, wagons, carriages, and buggies; but when he went in with Freeman & Co. there were in stock, and for sale, in the store, horse blankets, buggy robes, and dusters, whips, and collar pads, and he afterwards kept and sold some of each class of such goods and enumerated articles each year, down to the time of the commencement of this action. In October, 1883, the plaintiff sold and transferred the business, the good will of which he had purchased from defendant, to one Barney, but did not assign to him the contract on which this action is based; and in November, 1884, Barney sold and transferred the said business back again to plaintiff. After his purchase from Barney, the plaintiff continuously, up to the time of the trial, carried on in the town of Woodland "the business of saddlery, harness, and carriage trimming, and, in connection therewith, kept for sale, and sold therewith, robes and dusters, horse blankets, whips of all kinds, collars and collar pads, and other articles." It was claimed by the plaintiff in the court below that the sale of horse blankets, buggy robes, etc., was a part of the saddlery and harness business, and that defendant, by selling these articles after he bought in with Freeman & Co., violated his contract, and rendered himself liable for the stipulated damages. On the other hand, the defendant claimed that the articles named were general merchandise, and that the sale of them was not a part of any particular business or trade.

Upon this question the plaintiff's witnesses testified that the sale of the said articles was a part of the saddlery and harness business, and as much a part of it as the sale of any other article sold in connection therewith. The same witnesses, however, testified, on cross-examination, that the articles were sold in connection with other businesses, that they were sold in grocery stores and carriage repositories, and that more of them were kept and sold in general merchandise stores than in harness shops. One of the witnesses for defendant testified that he had been in business in Woodland for 30 years, and had kept general merchandise for sale; that he did not "consider horse blankets, buggy robes, or lap dusters or collar pads or whips, as belonging to the saddlery, harness, or carriage trimming business;" and that they were recognized as articles of general merchandise. And the defendant testified to the same effect, and, among other things, said: "I don't think they belong to any particular business. They are articles of general merchandise. They are so usually sold in all classes as general merchandise, in dry-goods stores, hardware stores, and especially whips and robes are sold with carriages in carriage repositories;" and that after he bought in with Freeman & Co., in connection with his hardware and agricultural business, he kept a carriage repository, and kept carriages and buggies on hand for sale. Defendant further testified that the plaintiff had every opportunity to know he was selling these articles; that plaintiff was often in his place; that the robes, whips, and blankets were lying in the most prominent places near the door, where people could see them; and that plaintiff made no objection before the commencement of this action. The testimony on both sides as to the sale of the said articles in connection with other classes of business than the saddlery and harness business was objected to by plaintiff, and it is urged that the court erred in admitting it. We see no error in the rulings. The evidence tended to support the defendant's theory, and was admissible for that purpose. It is further urged that the defendant's witnesses only stated that they did not "consider" and did not "think," etc., and that these were expressions of opinion, merely, and hence not sufficient to create a conflict in the evidence. We cannot accede to this view. Witnesses are not required to give their testimony with absolute positiveness. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440; Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 588. The witnesses, however, did state positively that the said articles were articles of general merchandise, and, if this was so, they did not belong to any particular trade or business. We think there was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the question under consideration, and that the verdict and judgment cannot, therefore, be disturbed. In view of what has been said, it would subserve no useful purpose to consider the other questions discussed by counsel. We discover no error which could affect the result, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. ANGELLOTI, Judge.

Application by Mary E. Rogers for an increased monthly allowance from S. L. Rogers, her divorced husband, for the support of their child. From an order granting the application, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the portion of the affidavit referred to in the opinion: "Affiant says that plaintiff is not a suitable or proper person to have the care, custody, or control of said child Herbert, or any other child, for the following reasons and others: That when affiant married said plaintiff, he supposed she was a single woman of good moral character, but that after a period of about one year affiant learned that plaintiff had, for nearly two years next prior thereto to said marriage, constantly been associating and running around and about San Francisco with a gay, fast man by the name of Dr. Moreno. That plaintiff even went to the cabin, house, domicile, or quasi residence of said Moreno, and there remained under the same roof, in the same house or cabin, with said Moreno, for a long time, Moreno's wife then not being there. That said Moreno at one time stayed at the rooms or residence of an unmarried Spanish woman at Sacramento, by the alias name of 'Corina,' a woman of unchaste reputation. That affiant married plaintiff in 1871, and on or about the 9th day of December, 1871, plaintiff then being enceinte, she by the use of a steel instrument called 'catheter,' —(which affiant now has in his possession,)—she used the same upon her person in such a manner as to produce a miscarriage or an abortion, whereby plaintiff was delivered of two stillborn male infants, which were thereafter buried in the garden of affiant's then residence at Sacramento, whereby affiant was put to very great expense on account thereof, to wit, several hundred dollars. That on the 27th day of May, 1872, while affiant was attending court at Woodland, plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of affiant, went to the store of Hamburger & Co., in said Sacramento, and, by false and deceptive statements, bought and had charged to this affiant dry goods to the amount of over $218, mostly for silk dress patterns, then took from affiant's house all the silverware, table linen, a large amount of sheets, pillowcases, towels, napkins, bedclothes, knives, forks, spoons, etc., and many other things, (all of which belonged to affiant long before affiant ever saw or was married to plaintiff,) and said plaintiff 'ran away,' and left for San Francisco, and there got credit on account of the said firm of said Hamburger & Co., and to their indebtedness, which shameful and disgraceful transaction cost affiant to settle said bills, get plaintiff home, and attempt to keep the said 'runaway' out of and from the public and press, more than $1,000. That plaintiff on the ——— day of ———, 1872, she then being again enceinte, by the use of said catheter, again used the same upon her person so as to produce another abortion or miscarriage, whereby she was again delivered of a stillborn male infant, which said infant was buried in said garden, beside those aforesaid, whereby affiant was again put to great costs, trouble, and expense thereby, to wit, several hundred dollars. That on the ——— day of ———, 1873, plaintiff asked affiant for $30, as she said, to buy jewelry for her mother. Affiant refused to give it, when plaintiff immediately took a gold watch and chain of hers, (a gift from affiant,) and went to the pawn shop of one Stineman, on Second street, in said Sacramento, and there pawned said watch and chain, and got $30 from said Stineman, which said sum affiant, to save his shame and mortification, paid to said Stineman to keep said transaction from becoming publicly known. That by reason of plaintiff's disgraceful conduct and transactions at Sacramento and Davisville, affiant was greatly mortified, disgraced, and for a long time they were the scandal of society, whereby affiant was irreparably injured in his position in the community, at the bar, and everywhere wherein his business relations or acquaintance extended, and especially in his profession, he having, before that time, been counsel for many of the largest firms in Sacramento, to wit, D. O. Mills & Co., Baker & Hamilton, Adams McNeal, N. L. Drew & Co., besides many others, nearly all of whom greatly disapproved and severely censured affiant for ever living with, or having anything to do with, plaintiff after her said 'run away.' That by reason of affiant's mortification, disgrace, and chagrin, caused as aforesaid by the acts of plaintiff, it was impossible for affiant to remain longer in said Sacramento, where he had a large and profitable practice, and he thereby gave up and sacrificed his business and came to Sausalito, plaintiff in the mean time pledging herself in the future to thus conduct herself different. That at Sausalito affiant built a comfortable residence for his family, was free from debt, had other property, and some money besides. That plaintiff, disregarding her said promise and duties as a wife and mother to her child, did on or about the 25th day of June, 1882, when she then expected in a few days to be confined and mother to another child, tell affiant with her own lips that the child then soon expected to be born,—these words, 'It is a matter in which you have no interest.' The effect of these words from the lips of plaintiff to affiant was such as may better be imagined than described. That on the 26th day of July, 1882, when plaintiff was about to be confined, she took a large quantity of ether or chloroform, with the intention, as affiant has reason to believe and does believe, she took the same for the express purpose of getting rid of her child. That she remained in a stupefied condition therefrom until July 28, 1882, at about 2 o'clock A. M., when she, her nurse, and the physician, who had been present for more than 30 hours, believed the said child then to be dead, and that unusual means must speedily be taken to try to save the life of plaintiff. That affiant, at that hour of the night, rode from Sausalito to San Rafael in the most hasty method, to procure another physician for consultation and assistance. That affiant thereby, by reason of plaintiff's taking said chloroform, was put to very heavy expense and trouble to save the life of plaintiff, and fortunately the child, who is now called 'Herbert,' plaintiff's sixth child, the subject of this controversy. That on the 16th day of July, 1883, while affiant was attending court at Suisun, plaintiff, unknown to affiant, gathered all the silverware, table linen, most of the blankets, sheets, much of the bedding, a lot of chinaware, and other household effects too numerous to mention, and, taking affiant's two children, again 'ran away,' leaving affiant's house, and the next day served papers upon affiant for a divorce, and which said papers are now on file in this court, and are a lasting disgrace and forever a stain to the name of her children. That thereby affiant was put to a large expense, to wit, hundred and hundreds of dollars, for counsel fees, costs, alimony, for plaintiff's numerous attorneys, and trouble, causing affiant to borrow money and thereby become largely in debt. And thereafter plaintiff returned to affiant's home, but she was wholly ignored by most of the people in society and among acquaintances, whereby affiant and his children were greatly scandalized in said society. That thereafter, on the 12th day of February, 1885, while affiant was away to court at Oakland, plaintiff, unknown to affiant, gathered all the silverware, all the bedclothes (except one blanket and one sheet) in the house, most of the crockery, linen, towels, napkins, curtains, knives, forks, spoons, etc., and, taking affiant's two children, 'ran away,' leaving all the doors, inside and outside, to affiant's house wide open, so any person could enter at liberty, and at the same time there was stolen from affiant's house the sum of $180, which belonged to parties for whom affiant had collected the same, which said sum affiant had to repay to said parties. That thereafter plaintiff commenced another suit for divorce against affiant, similar to the first, but affiant made no opposition whatsoever on the trial thereof, but allowed plaintiff, her mother, and sister to swear to anything and everything they wished, true and false, to procure a decree, whereby affiant might be freed and rid of her. That by the said decree, plaintiff was awarded much more than one half of affiant's property, notwithstanding none of said property was common or community property, affiant having (as plaintiff had not a decent garment to be married in) found the money for plaintiff to buy the dress and clothes plaintiff wore when they were unfortunately married, and the gold watch and chain she wears. Affiant further says that the disgraceful conduct of plaintiff since his said marriage with her has cost him more than $8,000, and affiant now has no home of his own, or but very little property left. Wherefore affiant asks this court, in justice to the future welfare of affiant's child, who is dear to him, and whom affiant wishes yet to bring up in a moral and respectable manner, that he may not become a hoodlum upon the streets of San Francisco, and a disgrace to society, that an order be made herein giving the care, custody, and control of said child Herbert to said affiant. S. J. ROGERS. Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 20th day of August, A. D. 1891. J. S. BELRUDE, Notary Public. [Seal.]"

S. L. Rogers, for appellant. T. C. Crowley, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. On the 4th day of September, 1885, appellant and respondent, formerly husband and wife, were divorced by a decree of the superior court of Marin county. The decree provided, among other things, that respondent should have the custody of the son of said parties, and that appellant should pay her $5 per month for the support and maintenance of said son. On the 24th day of August, 1891, the court, on the application of respondent, made an order that appellant pay to respondent $10 per month for the months of July and August, 1891, and thereafter $20 per month for the support of said child. Respondent filed an affidavit in support of her application, and appellant filed one against it. The court made the order as above stated, and appellant appealed from it to this court. As to the sum necessary for the support of said child, the affidavits are conflicting, and the sum allowed is not so large as to suggest an abuse of discretion by the court. Therefore we cannot interfere with the order. But appellant insists that the court erred in striking out a part of his affidavit. An examination of the part stricken out satisfies us that the matter stricken out was impertinent and scandalous, and that it was properly stricken out.

FARLEY v. MORAN et al. (No. 14,868.)

CONTRACTS — CONSIDERATION — BOND TO BUILD RAILROAD FENCES—ACTION — PLEADING—SURETIES.

1. In proceedings to condemn land for a railroad the complaint prayed the court to ascertain, in accordance with Code Civil Proc. § 1248, the cost of fences along the line of the road, and of cattle guards where necessary, and a bond for the construction of the fences was given, with the sureties required by section 1251. Held, in an action to recover from the sureties for violation of the bond, that, since the principals had taken possession of the land and built their railroad, sufficient consideration had passed to support the contract in the bond, even if the bond given was not a statutory one.

2. In an action against sureties for violation of a bond by the principals it is not necessary to allege any violation on the part of the sureties.

3. Where a company violates a bond to construct a fence along its railroad through plaintiff's land, plaintiff need not construct the fences before bringing an action on the bond.

4. In an action for violation of such a bond it need not be alleged or proved that the fences agreed to be built are necessary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. F. MASTEN, Judge.

Action by Catherine Farley against Moran Bros. and J. W. Doyle and J. C. Wimple for violation of a bond. From a judgment for plaintiff defendants Doyle and Wimple appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action is on a bond executed by Moran Bros. as principals, and J. W. Doyle and J. C. Wimple as sureties. The principals were never served with summons, and judgment was rendered against the sureties only. From that, and an order refusing a new trial, the defendants bring this appeal.

The bond was given under a proceeding for the condemnation of land for a public use; that is, for the building of a railroad. Those proposing to condemn the land were not associated as a corporation, but as copartners. It is provided in section 1244, Code Civil Proc., what parties may file a complaint in such an action; and the principals of the bond involved here are such parties as are included in the provisions of that statute. In section 1248, among other matters which must be done by the court, jury, or referee in assessing the damages by way of compensation to the owner of the land sought to be taken for a public use, is this: "That, if the property sought to be condemned be for a railroad, the cost of good and sufficient fences along the line of such railroad, and the cost of cattle guards where fences may cross the line of such railroad," must be ascertained and assessed by court, jury, or referee upon the legal testimony offered. The complaint in the action for condemnation proceedings, in which the bond in suit was given, prayed that this statutory provision should be complied with, and, in accordance with that prayer, the provision of the law was complied with. The sureties on the bond given in that proceeding under section 1251, Code Civil Proc., and against whom a judgment for a breach of the conditions of the bond was made and given in this action, now claim that the bond is void, and cannot be the basis of a recovery in the action. Their argument in support of this proposition is that, as to parties such as the principals on the bond and the defendants here, such a bond could, under the statute, only be given as compensation for damages done to the plaintiff's land, or the taking of the same fo a public use; and that such a bond is not the just compensation "first made or paid into court" for the landowner, as is required by section 14 of article 1 of the state constitution; that, therefore, the statute which authorizes such a bond as to the parties here giving it is unconstitutional, and the bond unauthorized by any valid law, and entirely void as a contract. The principals of this bond, however, prayed the court to proceed as it did in the condemnation suit, and have the damages ascertained and assessed for the fences required by the statute. They voluntarily gave the bond, and by virtue of that took possession of the plaintiff's land, and devoted it to a public use; that is, the building of a railroad. They thus received a consideration sufficient to support the contract contained in the bond, even if it be not a statutory bond. Upon a similar question, this court said: "We will not permit a party having complied with the terms proposed, and availed himself of the advantage of the order, to question its correctness." Battelle v. Connor, 6 Cal. 140. And it was said in Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 169: "Nor is the point that the appeal from the judgment was not taken within time, and that for that reason the undertaking of the sureties was without consideration, available to the defendants. Concede that the undertaking did not operate to legally stay proceedings under the judgment, (a point which we do not decide,) yet it in fact had that effect, and the appellants received all the benefit for which their sureties contracted; and, were they now allowed to say that their undertaking was nudum pactum, gross injustice might be done to the plaintiff, because he did not choose to act upon a doubtful right." The cases cited in opposition to this view are not, as we think, in point.

It is further insisted that the complaint fails to state a breach of the contract sued on. It is said in this connection that the bond requires the money to be paid into court, and that the complaint does not allege that it has not been paid into court, and therefore the demurrer should have been sustained. An inspection of the bond shows that the contention is not sound. The money was obligated to be paid to the plaintiff in the event of the failure of the Moran Bros. to build the fence, and the complaint alleges that the Moran Bros. have not paid the plaintiff any portion of the money which the bond obliged them to pay upon their failure to build the fences. It is further alleged that no breach of the bond is alleged as to the sureties; that the breaches alleged are only those of the principals. We do not perceive any force in this argument. The sureties were bound to pay on the failure of the principals to comply with the obligation, and it is alleged that they did not comply with it in a certain respect. The appellants argue further, in support of their position, that the demurrer should have been sustained, because the complaint does not state that the plaintiff had built the fences. We are unable to perceive wherein the law compels her to do this as a condition precedent to being paid the money wherewith to do it, which the defendants obligated themselves to pay. Certainly the case of Butte Co. v. Boydston, 64 Cal. 117, 29 Pac. Rep. 511, cited by appellants in aid of this contention, affords no support therefor. When the railroad or other obligor in the bond fails to build the fences according to the obligation, the case cited, supra, declares that "the landowner may sue upon the bond," just as has here been done. If the landowner obtains the money due upon a bond, and then does not build the fences, it is declared in that case that the landowner is responsible to the railroad company in certain cases; but nowhere is there any intimation in that case that the owner of the land shall build the fences before bringing suit on the bond, when the obligors have failed to build them. The appellants urge further as a reason for the reversal of the judgment and order that there was no allegation in the complaint, proof adduced, or finding made that the fences were necessary. The bond did not contain anything which limited the responsibility of Moran Bros. and their sureties to build necessary fences only. The bond being valid, under the circumstances of this case, a recovery could be had without alleging, proving, or finding anything outside of its terms. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

BANK OF YOLO v. WEAVER et al. (No. 14,827.)

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACT—AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS—STOCKHOLDERS.

1. A resolution of the board of directors authorizing the secretary to borrow money for the corporation is sufficient, though not entered on the minute book, and, therefore, in an action against stockholders to recover the money so borrowed, the admission in evidence of a resolution adopted by the board and entered on its minutes is immaterial.

2. Evidence that a person subscribed for stock is not sufficient proof that he actually owns the shares, when it does not appear that he bought them on credit, but rather that he was to pay for them at once, and it also appears that he did not pay or offer to pay for them, and that no certificate of them was ever issued to him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Yolo against N. M. Weaver and others to recover from defendants their proportionate share of money borrowed from plaintiff by the Woodland Woolen Manufacturing Company, in which company defendants were stockholders. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. E. Baker and Craig & Hawkins, for appellants. E. R. Bush, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover of certain stockholders of a corporation designated as the Woodland Woolen Manufacturing Company, their proportionate shares of certain moneys alleged to have been borrowed from the plaintiff, the Bank of Yolo, by the first-mentioned corporation. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, this appeal is taken. The facts surrounding the transaction seem in brief to be that the Woodland Woolen Manufacturing Company was in need of money to get into operation, and by written resolution of its board of directors, spread upon its minute book, ordered that its president and secretary give a note to the Bank of Yolo for $15,000, as "security for overdrafts." At the time this action was instituted the manufacturing corporation owed the Bank of Yolo about $19,214.97, for moneys drawn from bank, a portion of the same in pursuance of the written resolution authorizing the note, and the balance of borrowed money by the vote or resolve of the board of directors, which vote or resolve was not spread in writing upon the minutes in the corporation's book. But the evidence is sufficient, as we think, to show that all of this money was borrowed from the bank by the authority of the board of directors of the manufacturing corporation, and was used by it for its exclusive benefit. Therefore, the objection made by the defendants to the introduction in evidence of a resolution of the board of directors, and entered in the minutes after suit brought, ratifying the acts of the treasurer in borrowing and using for the purposes of the corporation all of the money sued for in this action in excess of what the written resolution called for authorizing the note, is untenable. The right of recovery here did not depend upon this alleged ratification; it depended primarily upon the authorization of the board in writing as to $15,000, and, as to the balance, upon the vote or resolve of the directors not reduced to writing, and upon the fact that this money was borrowed and applied to the uses of the corporation. Such a corporation cannot receive the benefits and uses of an executed contract, and then deny its obligation. Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 129, 7 Pac. Rep. 426; Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413; Pixley v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 198; Foulke v. Railroad Co., 51 Cal. 365. Therefore, whether the resolution of ratification made after suit brought was improperly admitted or not, which we do not decide, is immaterial, as the cause was tried by the court, and the evidence was ample without it to fix the liability of the defendants, and it does not appear that the court rested its decision upon that resolution. Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 123, 28 Pac. Rep. 110.

But the appellants further object that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to show a cause of action, in that it does not sufficiently show how many shares were subscribed for, so as that, from such statement and the statement of what number of shares each defendant owned, it can be determined what was their proportionate share of the indebtedness or liability. The allegation objected to runs thus: "That 305 shares of the capital stock of said Woodland Woolen Manufacturing Company, and no more, were taken, subscribed, and fully paid for." This, we think, was sufficient under the demurrer as filed. Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 29, 25 Pac. Rep. 752. We perceive nothing of merit in the point raised as to the supplemental complaint; if not good as such a complaint, it stated a good cause of action as an amended complaint.

It is further alleged that Mr. Walker, one of the defendants, owned 20 shares more of stock than it is found by the court that he owned, and that he should have been held for a proportionate share of the indebtedness on those shares of stock. It is true that the evidence is that he subscribed for those shares, but it does not appear that he bought them on a credit, but rather that he was to pay for them at once, and it also appears that he did not pay or offer to pay for them, and that no certificate of them was ever issued to him, and that they were never really sold to him. While the evidence is not so convincing as to render it absolutely certain that such was the state of facts, yet it tends, as we think, to show that he did not own them, and hence we do not feel disposed to recommend the disturbance of the finding as to that matter. Upon the whole record we perceive no prejudicial error, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

MILLER et al. v. COX. (No. 14,309.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—TIME OF ESSENCE OF CONTRACT.

Defendant, on advice of plaintiffs, purchased certain land, which plaintiffs knew was to increase in value, and a contract was entered into by which defendant, on November 1st, was to convey to plaintiffs two thirds of the land on payment of their proportion of the purchase price, taxes, and other expenses. If payment was not made on the date named, plaintiffs were to forfeit all claims to a conveyance of the property. Held, that time was not of the essence of the contract, and that a tender of payment on November 26th was good, defendant not having notified plaintiffs of the amount due, or made request for payment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Wm. A. Purrington and E. E. Rowell, for appellants. E. B. Stanton, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. In 1884, Mr. Matthew Gage was engaged in the construction of a canal, which was to take water from a station in San Bernardino county, and to conduct the same to lands below the point of diversion, for irrigation. For this purpose he employed Mr. C. C. Miller, a civil engineer, and intrusted to him the sole management of the matter,—full power to locate the line and construct the ditch. The defendant, Cox, knowing that Miller was clothed with the authority to determine where the ditch should be run, visited Miller, and asked him "to give him some points on what land was going to come under the Gage canal." It appears that Miller and his son-in-law, plaintiff Richardson, had previously agreed upon the line on which the ditch was to be constructed, and had taken steps to secure a portion of the lands to be benefited by the water which it would carry. The result of the interview is shown by the testimony of Richardson, which is substantially as follows, and is uncontradicted: "Shortly after Miller came in, and we three talked it over, and agreed to let Mr. Cox in on the purchase of the land, * * * with the understanding that he was to put up all the money, pay the taxes, the twenty per cent., and the insurance, etc. After the final payment we were each to come in and have one third of the land, and pay one third of the cost. * * * He approached us on the subject. We did not ask him to come into the deal. He saw us two or three times. My father-in-law took him over the land and showed him where it was. * * * After talking to us he went and made application to the railroad company for the land, and entered into the agreement with the railroad company. After that he entered into this contract with us. At the time of the agreement there was no water available for the land,—no water anywhere near it. It was not fit for agricultural land. * * * The land, I should think, was worth no more than about eight or ten dollars an acre." The witness further testified that the canal had been completed, and it had made a difference in the value of the land of about $90 per acre. On cross-examination he testified that he demanded of Mr. Cox, on November 22d, an account of the money that was due him under the contract, and on November 26th tendered him $1,200 in gold coin, which tender was refused. Witness also testified, and his statement is not controverted, that there were two contracts drawn up. "The first contract was to the effect that after Mr. Cox had advanced all the money, and made all the payments, we were all to come in and pay one third of the purchase price of the land, and have one third of the lands each. After he had paid twenty per cent. of the purchase money he was dissatisfied with that. They were slow with the canal, and he was fearful that they would not get there. And we agreed to make another agreement with him, as he wished to." The second agreement, referred to in this testimony, is the agreement upon which the plaintiffs rely in this case. By its terms it is provided that Miller and Richardson should each pay Cox "one undivided one third of all money expended by him [Cox] for the purchase of said land, whether principal or interest, and of all taxes and expenses, and ten per cent. per annum interest thereon from the date of such payments. In the event of a failure on the part of the parties of the second part to pay each his one third of all sums advanced by the party of the first part, [Cox,] then due on the first day of September, 1889, together with one third each of the balance due and to become due on the contract above mentioned of party of the first part with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations, in law or equity, to convey said property, and said parties of the second part, or either of them, shall forfeit all right thereto." The complaint alleges the execution of the agreement, the condition of the property prior to and at the time of the execution of the agreement, the circumstances under which the latter was made, the construction of the canal, and the effect of its operation upon the value of the land, the tender made on November 26th, and demand for a deed; and as an excuse for their failure to make the tender and demand earlier, the plaintiffs alleged mistake, oversight, and pressure of business affairs; that defendant never demanded any money from them or notified them as to the amount of money he claimed to be due him under the contract; that the lands had not increased in value since the 1st day of November, and that defendant has sustained no loss on account of plaintiffs' delay in tendering the money. They, therefore, pray for a judgment requiring the defendant to convey to them a two-thirds undivided interest in the property. The answer admits the execution and delivery of the agreement, but denies nearly every other material allegation of the complaint. The court found that the allegations of the complaint with respect to the condition of the land, the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and the circumstances under which the defendant procured them to enter into the contract, were true, and "that it was in consideration of the information so furnished as aforesaid, as to the course and location of the said canals, * * * that the defendant entered into and made and executed with the plaintiff the agreement;" that the land had increased in value from eight to one hundred dollars per acre by reason of the construction and operation of the canal; that the defendant took, and has ever since retained, possession of the lands; that the plaintiffs made a tender as alleged on November 26th, but did not tender the amount of any taxes or interest thereon, for the reason that they did not know the amount of the same, but that the plaintiffs offered to pay the defendant any sum which was due to him, and demanded that he should convey to them the interest which he had agreed to sell and convey; that the defendant refused to convey as requested; that the land was of no greater value on the 26th day of November than it was on the 1st day of November, 1889; that the failure of the plaintiffs to make a tender of performance prior to November 26th was the result of oversight and neglect, and was not intentional on the part of either of them; that defendant never demanded any money from either of the plaintiffs, and never notified either of them as to the amount of money due him under the contract. As conclusions of law the court found that "time was of the essence of the agreement. * * * That plaintiffs did not offer performance of the terms of their agreement * * * at the time fixed * * * for such performance, and by such default they have forfeited all right to a conveyance under the said agreement. * * * That an offer of performance on the part of plaintiffs on the 1st day of November, 1889, was a condition precedent on their part. * * * That plaintiffs have failed to account in a reasonable manner for their delay in tendering performance." Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and from this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the plaintiffs have appealed.

It is claimed by the appellants that under section 1492, Civil Code, time cannot be said to be of the essence of the contract, unless it is expressly declared in the contract that "time is of the essence of the obligation." The section referred to provides that "where delay in performance is capable of exact and entire compensation, and time is not expressly declared to be of the essence of the obligation, an offer of performance, accompanied with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due," etc. Prior to the adoption of this provision of the Civil Code our own authorities had left in great doubt the question as to what language was necessary to make time of the essence of a contract. In Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 9, the court said: "In construing contracts, it is often one of the most perplexing questions with which courts of equity have to deal, whether the time within which an act is to be performed is of the essence of the agreement. In the very nature of the case it is impossible to prescribe any general and uniform rule on the subject, and each case must necessarily be decided upon its own circumstances." In that case it was held the provision in the contract, to the effect that, if the plaintiffs should fail to comply with the conditions, the land and improvements should revert to the defendant, was inserted merely to induce a prompt performance. In Grey v. Tubbs, decided about a year before the adoption of the Codes, it was held that a provision similar to that under consideration in Steele v. Branch, supra, made time of the essence of the contract, the court saying: "It would be difficult to express with greater clearness and certainty than the parties did in this contract that time is of the essence of the contract, except it were done by the insertion of those very words in the instrument." 43 Cal. 364. In view of the unsettled condition of the law upon this subject at the time of the adoption of section 1492 of the Civil Code, and of the fact that "in constructing contracts it is often one of the most perplexing questions with which courts of equity have to deal, whether the time within which an act to be performed is of the essence of the agreement," it is clear that the legislature intended to obviate all difficulty in that regard, so far as subsequent contracts were concerned. The commissioners make this intention plain in their note to the section, where it is said: "This clause obviates the difficulties which constantly arise in determining whether time is of the essence of a contract or not. The provision that 'an offer of performance, accompanied with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due,' is also new." We do not think it is necessary, in order to make time of the essence of the obligation, that it should be declared to be so in the words of the statute; but the intent to make it of the essence of the contract must be clearly, unequivocally, and unmistakably shown by an express declaration. Waterman on Specific Performance says that "the parties themselves may stipulate that time shall be of the essence of the contract. This has been done in almost all of the modern cases in which time has been strictly regarded." Section 461. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Specific Performance, says that "the prescribing a day at or before which, or a period within which, an act must be done, even with a stipulation that it shall be done at or before the day named, or within the period mentioned, does not render the time essential with respect to such an act." Section 392. See, also, section 374. "In order to render time thus essential, it must be clearly and expressly stipulated that it shall be so; it is not enough that a time is mentioned during which or before which something shall be done." Fry Spec. Perf. § 712; Jones v. Robbins, 29 Me. 351; Barnard v. Lee, 97 Mass. 95. It cannot be said that the language in the contract before us "clearly, unequivocally, and unmistakably" shows an intent to make time of the essence of the contract. It certainly does not expressly declare such to be the intention of the parties. The parties of the second part could not know how much they were to pay until after they had an accounting with the party of the first part. The contract informed them only of the amount they were to pay on account of the purchase price paid to the railroad company. They could not know, until after an accounting with the defendant, what expense he had incurred in making the purchase, or how much he had paid on account of taxes, and could not know how much interest they were required to pay, without being informed as to the date of the payments. The parties of the second part were to pay each "his one third of all sums advanced by party of the first part, and then due on the first day of November, 1889, together with one third each of the balance due and to become due on the contract above mentioned of party of the first part with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company." This provision is somewhat ambiguous. As a matter of fact the last payment was not due from Cox to the railroad company until November 4th, but it was actually paid on October 16th. The parties of the second part were to pay interest on all the payments. They were also to pay one third of the expenses which Cox had incurred in securing the title, one third of the taxes, and one third of the amount to become due on the contract. How could they know what amount they ought to tender Cox? That was a matter within the knowledge of the defendant alone, and it was his duty, we think, to inform them as to the amount he had expended. Peasley v. Hart, 65 Cal. 522, 4 Pac. Rep. 537. Of course the parties of the second part could have inquired of the defendant the amount due on November 1st, and could on that day have tendered the amount named by him; but were they bound to accept as correct the amount claimed by him, and pay the same, or "forfeit all right" to a conveyance? A proper construction of the contract, when all of its provisions are read and considered together, we think simply fixes November 1st as the time of settlement, and gives to the parties of the second part a reasonable time in which to ascertain the amount due. A fair consideration of all the provisions of the contract, and the circumstances under which it was made, precludes the idea that the plaintiffs had to make payment on the 1st of November, or "forfeit all right" to the property. If Cox desired to put the plaintiffs in default for nonpayment, according to the terms of the contract, he ought to have given them a statement of the payments he had made and the dates thereof. On November 26th plaintiffs tendered to Cox the sum of $1,200, which was more than the latter was entitled to receive from them under the contract. Our conclusion is that time is not of the essence of the contract, and that the plaintiffs were not in default at the time they tendered the $1,200 to the defendant.

It may be admitted that there is an apparent conflict of authority upon this subject. In most of the cases cited by respondent, however, time was either declared to be of the essence of the contract, or language was used amounting to an express declaration of such intention. In some of the cases cited there was no part performance by the vendee, and the considerations were mere cash payments. In the case at bar the court expressly finds that it was in consideration of the information which the plaintiffs furnished to the defendant as to the course and location of the canal, and the lands over which it would be constructed, that the defendant entered into the contract. Without this information obtained from the plaintiffs, the defendant could not have known what lands to purchase; and now, after plaintiffs, relying upon defendant's promise to convey, have lost their right to purchase the lands at $8 per acre, it would seem to be unjust and unconscionable to allow the defendant to defeat the plaintiffs in this action because through mistake and inadvertence they allowed 26 days to elapse before making a tender of the amount they were required to pay him. Even if time were declared to be of the essence of the contract, it is doubtful whether under the circumstances shown in this case a court of equity would refuse to enforce specific performance of the contract. Wat. Spec. Perf. § 461. It is claimed that no sufficient excuse is given for the delay. In determining the question whether delay is excusable no general or uniform rule on the subject can be prescribed; each case must necessarily be decided upon its own circumstances. In Hubbell v. Van Schoening, 49 N. Y. 331, the court said: "If the situation of the parties or property is not changed so that injury will result, and the party is reasonably vigilant, the court would relieve him from the consequences of the delay. * * * A party may not trifle with his contracts, and still ask the aid of a court of equity. Neither will the law be administered in a spirit of technicality, and so as to defeat the ends of justice. In this instance there is no vexation, no room for suspicion of any trick on the part of the plaintiffs; at most it was a mistake in depending upon the promise of the defendant's attorney to advise him when the defendants arrived, if they should arrive on the day fixed for the performance of the contract." In the case at bar the court has found that the failure of the plaintiffs to tender performance was the result of oversight and not intentional neglect. It is not pretended that they were trifling with the defendant or his contract, or that they intended to vex him in any manner, and the evidence is uncontradicted that the property was worth no more on the day tender was made than it was on the 1st day of November. We think, therefore, that the delay was excusable. Butler v. Archer, 76 Iowa, 551, 41 N. W. Rep. 309. It was not necessary under the circumstances for the plaintiffs to deposit the money in court to make their tender good. Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 256, 14 Pac. Rep. 369. The judgment must be reversed, but there is no necessity for a new trial. The amount that is due from each of the plaintiffs is undisputed. Mr. Cox himself stated that it was $552.10. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside its conclusions of law, and substitute therefor other conclusions in accordance with the views herein expressed, and to enter a decree in favor of the plaintiffs in accordance with the prayer of their complaint.

MARBLE LIME CO. et al. v. LORDSBURG HOTEL CO. (No. 14,664.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — CONSOLIDATED ACTIONS TO ENFORCE—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS — QUESTIONS OF FACT—EVIDENCE.

1. Where several actions against the same defendant to enforce mechanics' liens are consolidated, the fact that the court makes separate findings in each case is not in itself sufficient cause for reversal. Willamette, etc., Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 29 Pac. Rep. 629, 94 Cal. 229, distinguished.

2. Where the court found in one of such actions that "the building was completed on the 2d day of August, 1889," and in another that it "was never actually completed," the findings are not fatally contradictory when it appears that, though the building was never actually completed, work on it continued until July 2, 1889, from which date there was a cessation for more than 30 days.

3. In an action to enforce mechanics' liens, whether there was a continuance of work during a certain period, or a cessation for 30 days, are questions of fact, and not conclusions of law, where the material point is whether or not the liens were filed in time, and the court need not "find the evidence" that establishes such facts.

4. In consolidated actions to enforce mechanics' liens it appeared that the contractor abandoned the work in July, 1888; that defendant, the owner, continued the construction of the building thereafter; that it employed a man as keeper, and to paint the building, a hotel; that he lived in it until July 3, 1889; that he continued painting until in May, did at least three days work in June, and did his last work on July 3d of the same year; that no work was done thereafter; that the basement was not painted because of a dispute between defendant and the painter; that without such painting the building was not completed; that the painter did not remove his painting material, or any of his implements, prior to July 3, 1889. Held, that the finding that work on the building continued until July 3, 1889, without cessation for a period of 30 consecutive days, was not erroneous.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Four consolidated actions by the Marble Lime Company and others against the Lordsburg Hotel Company to enforce mechanics' liens. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. Cassatt Davis, for appellant. John W. Mitchell, W. S. Wright, Metcalf & Metcalf, Chas. L. Batcheller, and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is a consolidation of four actions brought under the mechanic's lien law to enforce liens against a building and land owned by the Lordsburg Hotel Company, a corporation. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and the hotel company appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. There are elaborate briefs on file, those of appellant covering quite a wide range of subjects. Appellant's contention, however, is resolved into two main propositions: First, that the findings are defective; and, second, that the chief finding of fact is not warranted by the evidence. But the real point aimed at is that plaintiffs' liens were filed too late.

1. The court below put its findings in the form of separate findings in each of the four cases. Such action was hostilely criticised in Willamette, etc., Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. Rep. 629; but in that case there were also separate judgments, while in the case at bar there is only one judgment. It is, no doubt, much better to have only one set of findings. Such a course avoids needless repetitions of facts common to all the cases, prevents possible complications and inconsistencies, and is altogether the clearer and more orderly method. But the question is one mainly of good taste and correct method; and the mere fact that a court adopts the course pursued in the case at bar is not in itself a sufficient cause for reversal. It is contended that the findings in two of the cases are fatally contradictory, because it is found in one place that "the building was completed on the 2d day of August, 1889," and in another that it "was never actually completed." It is clear, however, that the real facts found were that, although the building was never actually completed, work on it continued until the 2d day of July, 1889, on which day work ceased, and the cessation of work thence continued for more than 30 days. These facts constituted a "completion," under section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and we do not see that any harm was done by putting the finding in both forms, although one, perhaps, would have been sufficient.

Appellant's counsel contend very strenuously that the court did not find enough of facts. The pivotal point in the case is, as before stated, whether or not plaintiffs' liens were filed in time. Upon this point the court found that work continued, without a cessation of 30 days, until July 2, 1889; that it then ceased for more than 30 days; and that within 30 days thereafter the liens were filed. If these facts were truly found, then the liens were filed in time. But counsel contend that the two findings first named are not findings of fact, but were conclusions, (of law, we suppose,) based on facts not found. Certain witnesses gave certain testimony; and, as we understand counsel, that testimony should be considered as establishing certain facts which should have been found, so that it could be seen whether these facts justified the findings above noticed. But this method of converting testimony into facts might be applied to any case, and would lead inevitably to this result: that the court should find evidence. It would also lead to such complications and refinements on the already much vexed subject of findings as would bewilder justice. It was stated in Willamette, etc., Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., supra, that whether there was a "completion," and whether there was a "trivial imperfection," were questions of fact; and it is quite clear that whether there was a continuance of work during a certain period, or a "cessation" for 30 days, are also questions of fact. We think, therefore, that the court in the case at bar found the facts, and the only facts necessary to be found. Appellant's claim for a reversal must rest, therefore, upon the contention that the evidence does not support the findings.

2. Appellant contends that the evidence does not warrant the finding that the building was never actually completed, or the finding that work "was continued to the 2d day of July, 1889, without cessation for a period of thirty consecutive days intervening at any time," and that "on July 2, 1889, labor on said building was done." (It is not disputed that work was begun in Sepember, 1887, or that there was no work done after July 2, 1889, or that the liens were filed within 30 days after August 2, 1889.) It appears from the evidence and pleadings, and is not disputed, that in August, 1887, the appellant made a written contract with one Boggs for the building of the hotel, not including, however, the painting; that neither said contract nor any memorandum thereof was recorded as required by the Code; that Boggs commenced work on the hotel early in September, 1887, and continued work under the contract until July, 1888, when he abandoned it; and that thereupon the appellant continued the construction of the building. It is also clear and undisputed that, at the time Boggs quit, B. J. Davis was engaged in painting the hotel under the employment of the appellant; that about that time, or shortly afterwards, Davis was also employed by appellant as keeper, to take charge of the building, and that he did take charge of it, and lived in it until July 3, 1889; that he continued his work of painting—taking charge of the house, also, and living in it—until some time in May, 1889, (except as to an asserted former cessation;) that he did his last work on July 3, 1889; that no other work was done on the building thereafter; and that the first story or basement of the hotel has never been painted at all. There was also evidence tending to show, and from which the court below might well conclude, that it was the intention of appellant to paint the basement; that it was not painted because there was a misunderstanding between appellant and said Davis about the latter's duty under his contract to paint said basement; and without the painting of said basement the said building was not completed. Davis himself swore that "when I quit work (July 3, 1889) the building was not completed." It is contended by appellant that it should have been found from the evidence that Davis substantially ceased to work in the spring of 1889, because the work done by him afterwards was trivial in character, consisting mostly of improving or "touching up" some of his former work, and painting a tin waterspout. It is also contended that as, under the evidence, it was possible for a prior period of 30 days to have elapsed before July in which Davis did not actually do any work, therefore the court ought to have found that there was a prior period of "cessation of labor" for 30 days. It is admitted, however, that work was done in May, 1889. It also clearly appears in the evidence that at least three days' work was done in June, and that work was done on July 2d or 3d. It is true that it does not appear positively on what days in May the work in that month was done, or on what days it was done in June; and it is no doubt possible that the former was done in the early part of May and the latter in the latter part of June, in which event there might have been no actual work for a period of 30 days commencing in May and ending in June. But, if such had been the fact, the burden was on appellant to show it, and at all events it was not the duty of the court to find such fact from the evidence before it.

As to the work being trivial, that was a question for the court below, even if that question could be considered as material when the issue is as to cessation of work. "Trivial imperfection," as used in the Code, relates to the question whether or not there has been an actual completion of the building. Neither do we think it material that Davis was not paid for the work done in June, or that appellant had not expressly ordered it to be done. It was work which it was his duty to do in order to complete what he had before done imperfectly. But the peculiar circumstances in this case suggest the question: What evidence is necessary to show such a "cessation from labor for 30 days," within the meaning of section 1187 of Code Civil Proc., as will bar a lien if not filed within 30 days thereafter? Those words certainly do not mean a mere clandestine stopping of actual work for 30 days, and then beginning it again, without any indicia to the world that it had been stopped for 30 days. They were not contrived as a means of defrauding lienholders. The cessation should certainly be of such character as to carry some charge of notice to a careful person. In Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. Rep. 648, cited by appellant, the point involved, and the only point decided, was that a lien claimant must file his lien within 30 days after a cessation of labor for 30 days; and that the provision of the Code on that subject was not, as contended, a mere privilege to the claimant, but also a limitation. But there was no question in that case as to the actual "cessation of labor for thirty days," or as to the meaning of those words. Moreover, the plaintiffs there had knowledge of the cessation. The court, in its opinion, says: "On the 9th day of April, 1887, the contractor quit work on the building, and refused to finish it, and no work or labor was done thereon for more than thirty days thereafter. The plaintiff had notice of this cessation of labor upon the building for thirty days at the time thereof." It is quite evident that the contractor publicly quit work and left the premises, and that the plaintiff actually knew of this fact, and of the fact that no more work had been done by any one for more than 30 days thereafter. But in the case at bar, when Boggs abandoned his contract for his part of the work, Davis was engaged in doing the painting; and, so far as appearances indicated to respondents or to the world, he remained in that same situation until July, 1889. He stopped at the building all the time. There is no pretense that he removed his painting material, or his brushes, or any of the implements by which he carried on his trade. He did work on the building at intervals, at least, until July 3d, and the painting was then still unfinished; and there is no pretense that respondents knew, or had any reasonable grounds for suspecting, that he had let 30 days go by at any one time without doing some work. Under these circumstances, we do not think that the court erred in finding that work had continued until July. Whatever may be thought of the hardships which the present lien law sometimes imposes upon the owners of buildings, still courts cannot undertake to break its force by refusing to apply to the rights of lien claimants the ordinary rules of evidence and the common principles of fair dealing. These views apply also to the contention of appellant that there was still another cessation of labor for 30 days prior to May, 1889.

The contention that the time for filing liens expired when Boggs quit is not tenable. In the first place, there was no "occupation" or "acceptance" of the building within the meaning of section 1187; and, in the second place, the provision about "occupation," etc., applies only "in case of contracts." In the findings in one of the cases (the Smilie Case) it is made to appear—incorrectly, of course, and no doubt inadvertently—that Boggs continued his work until August 2, 1889, and completed his contract on that day. Appellant makes some criticism of this finding, although we do not understand it to be seriously contended that the finding constitutes material error. The finding, taken as true, does not substantially change the positions or rights of the parties. The learned arguments of counsel for appellant run into many ramifications and bypaths, but we think that we have sufficiently noticed their main contentions. We see no good reason for disturbing the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WARNOCK v. HARLOW et al. (No. 14,778.)

TRUSTS—CONVEYANCE BY TRUSTEE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—UNRECORDED DEED—LIS PENDENS.

1. Where a trust does not appear in the deed by which the trustee derives title, a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration from the trustee takes the property discharged of the trust.

2. Civil Code, § 2243, provides that "every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith for a valuable consideration." Held, that this section does not cast on a purchaser from a trustee the burden of alleging and proving that he was a bona fide purchaser when he was not a party to an action in which the trust was established.

3. Civil Code, § 1213, provides that every duly-recorded conveyance is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers; section 1214 declares that every conveyance of real property is void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first recorded; and section 1217 provides that an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof. Held, that an unrecorded deed by a trustee to a bona fide purchaser in possession in violation of the trust was not void as to all persons except the parties to it.

4. Where a cestui que trust brings an action to compel his trustee to reconvey to him the trust property after the trustee has conveyed it to a bona fide purchaser, and the clerk executes a conveyance to plaintiff therein, pursuant to the decree, such cestui que trust is not a "subsequent purchaser," within the meaning of Civil Code, § 1214, providing that every conveyance of real property is void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith whose conveyance is first recorded.

5. In an action by a tenant against two persons, each claiming to be the owner of the demised land, to determine which defendant was entitled to the rents, it appeared from the findings that the wife of one B. held the legal title to the land; that he brought an action against her to establish a trust, and compel her to reconvey the land to him, and filed a lis pendens; that there was a decree in his favor; that the clerk afterwards executed a deed to B. in pursuance of the decree, and the latter conveyed to defendant C.; that five hours before the commencement of the suit by B. his wife conveyed the land to defendant H., who was in possession, and did not record his deed until a year afterwards. There was no fact alleged or proved which would invalidate the deed to H. Held, that a judgment in favor of defendant C. was not sustained by the findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action by W. E. Warnock against W. P. Harlow and A. P. Catlin to determine which of the defendants is entitled to receive from plaintiff, as tenant, the rents of certain lands, of which each defendant claims to be the owner. From a judgment for defendant Catlin, defendant Harlow appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Hart, for appellant. A. J. & Elwood Bruner, Add C. Hinkson, and John W. Armstrong, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. On May 4, 1881, W. W. Brison was the owner of the lands described in the complaint, and on that day conveyed the same to his wife, Carrie M. Brison. On September 15, 1886, W. W. Brison commenced an action against his wife, the object of which was to obtain a decree declaring that she held the title to said lands in trust for himself, and to compel a reconveyance; and at the same time filed[1] a lis pendens in the recorder's office. On November 22, 1888, a decree was entered in said cause requiring Mrs. Brison to execute such conveyance within 10 days, and, in default thereof, directing the clerk of the court to execute such deed in her name, and such deed was made and delivered by the clerk on December 5, 1888, and recorded on the same day. On November 29, 1888, after the entry of said decree, and before the execution of the deed by the clerk, W. W. Brison conveyed the land mentioned to the defendant Catlin, one of the respondents herein. On September 15, 1886, some four or five hours before the suit of Brison vs. Brison was commenced, and before the lis pendens was filed, Mrs. Brison conveyed the same land to appellant W. P. Harlow, but which deed was not recorded until August 15, 1887. The plaintiff in this action, W. E. Warnock, was the lessee of the same land from Mrs. Brison from October 1, 1885, for one year, and again for a second year, ending October 1, 1887, and paid the rent to her. From October 1, 1887, up to October 1, 1890, Warnock was tenant of the same land under a lease from Harlow, and for the first year paid the rent to Harlow. The rent for the second and third years is the subject of this controversy.

It is further contended on behalf of respondent Catlin that, as Mrs. Brison held the land in trust, the beneficial estate being in her husband, Harlow acquired no larger estate than she held; and that, if he took any title under her conveyance, it was as trustee for W. W. Brison. Assuming that Mrs. Brison was a trustee for the benefit of her husband, that trust not appearing upon the deed, which conveyed to her the legal title, it does not follow that her grantee did not take the property discharged of the trust. Civil Code, §§ 856, 2243. It is assumed and asserted by counsel for respondent Catlin that Harlow must aver and prove that he was a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and that, unless he does so, he is a mere volunteer; and in support of this proposition section 2243 of the Civil Code is cited. That section provides: "Every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith and for a valuable consideration." If the appellant were bound by the judgment against his grantor in the case of Brison vs. Brison, the burden would be upon him to show that he "purchased in good faith, and paid a valuable consideration." But appellant was not a party to that proceeding, and is not bound by the judgment. As to him, it has not been adjudged that his grantor was a trustee. That judgment is conclusive only "between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action." Code Civil Proc. § 1908, subd. 2; Hall v. Boyd, 60 Cal. 443. There is, therefore, no ground to justify the assertion that appellant was a volunteer, or not a purchaser in good faith, unless it appears that that question was litigated and adjudicated in this case; and that does not appear. The complaint of Warnock, the tenant, recites the ground upon which appellant and respondent Catlin, respectively, claimed to be entitled to the rents, and in this recital disclosed that appellant claimed under a deed from Mrs. Brison, but did not disclose or allege that it was made prior to the commencement of the action of Brison vs. Brison; and, as to respondent's claim, alleged that it was under a deed from Brison, executed after the judgment in his favor. There was no allegation in the complaint that appellant purchased with notice of the trust, or that he was not a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Respondent Catlin filed his answer first, and admitted "the several averments of fact in said complaint contained," and made no other allegations of fact. He therefore stood directly upon the judgment and the deed made in pursuance of it, and the argument of his counsel is directed almost wholly to the proposition that appellant was bound by that judgment, notwithstanding the finding of the court that appellant's deed was made and delivered before the commencement of the action, as alleged in his answer. As we have seen, appellant claimed under a prior deed, and that it was first recorded. The presumption was that appellant acquired thereby the estate which his deed purported to convey, and he was in possession by his tenant.

against W. W. Brison, (under whom respondent claims, and whose lis pendens was first recorded,) the unrecorded deed from Mrs. Brison to appellant was void, and cites section 1217 of the Civil Code in support. This section is as follows: "An unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof." This section, counsel say, is the same as though it said: "An unrecorded instrument is invalid except as between the parties thereto," etc. If it were clear that section 1217 of the Civil Code means what counsel claims, it would not be necessary to make the paraphrase. If, however, counsel are right in their construction, Smith v. Hodsdon, 78 Me. 180, 3 Atl. Rep. 276; Collingwood v. Brown, 106 N. C. 362, 10 S. E. Rep. 868; and Utley v. Fee, 33 Kan. 683, 7 Pac. Rep. 555,—cited by them, are in point; otherwise they are not. The Maine section is: "No conveyance * * * is effectual against any person except the grantor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless the deed is recorded," etc. In North Carolina a deed only becomes effective by filing for record; and in neither of these states is notice of the pendency of an action required to be filed or recorded; and the Kansas statute is the same as that of Maine. Our Code provisions touching the recording of deeds must be construed together. At common law, recording was not necessary to the validity of the deed, or to make it effective against all subsequent conveyances; and such is the law now, except so far as our recording acts have expressly, or by necessary implication, limited their effect and operation. The object of these recording acts is to give "constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees," (Civil Code, § 1213,) and to declare the effect of the failure to record a prior conveyance as against a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same property whose conveyance is first recorded, (Civil Code, § 1214;) and, if that section stood alone, a subsequent grantee, whose deed was first recorded, would have taken the title, even though he had actual notice of the prior unrecorded deed. To prevent this, or at least to place the matter beyond question, section 1217 of the Civil Code declared that "an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof." It will be seen that this section, at least as to the last clause, is a necessary qualification of section 1214, and must therefore be taken in connection with it; and it should also be noticed that the only persons as to whom the failure to record a deed makes it void are subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith and for a valuable consideration, while the construction contended for by counsel would make it void as to all persons, (except the parties and those who had notice,) including heirs and devisees and purchasers or grantees in bad faith and without consideration. Nor could the filing of the lis pendens, as contended by counsel, operate as a prior recording of a subsequent conveyance, so as to make the deed executed by the clerk to Brison relate back to the commencement of the action, as against the deed to Harlow, which was executed before the suit was begun, and recorded before the deed made by the clerk to Brison was executed; for Brison was not a subsequent purchaser, within the meaning of the statute. If he acquired title either under the decree or deed, it must have been upon other grounds. Nor was the lis pendens such an "instrument" as the statute contemplates. The word "conveyance," as used in sections 1213 and 1214 of the Civil Code, is defined by section 1215; and the word "instrument" as used in the recording acts, was construed in Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564, where it was held to mean "some written paper or instrument, signed and delivered by one person to another, transferring the title to or giving a lien upon property, or giving a right to a debt or duty," and that it did not include a writ of attachment. The deed made in 1881 by W. W. Brison to his wife undoubtedly vested in her the legal title to the land; and, as between those parties, the judgment finally rendered in the case of Brison vs. Brison, November 22, 1888, is conclusive of the fact that said deed, though purporting to convey an unqualified ownership and title, vested in Mrs. Brison the title in trust for her husband.

It is contended by respondent Catlin that Harlow, the grantee of Mrs. Brison, though the deed under which he claims was executed and delivered to him before suit was commenced against her, and before the notice of the pendency of the action was filed, is nevertheless bound by that judgment, for the reason that his deed was not recorded until after the lis pendens was filed and recorded; in other words, that the holder of a prior unrecorded deed is to be regarded as a purchaser pendente lite, and therefore bound by the judgment. This question, as thus presented, is res nova in this state, and a full discussion of it would involve an examination of several provisions of the statutes, and the construction heretofore given to each. Certainly this contention of counsel for respondent cannot be sustained upon any reasonable construction of section 409 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for filing and recording a notice of the pendency of the action in the cases there mentioned. That section provides: "* * * From the time of filing such notice for record only shall a purchaser or incumbrancer of the property affected thereby be deemed to have constructive notice of the pendency of the action, and only of its pendency against parties designated by their real names." The mere pendency of a suit does not, as at common law, charge the subsequent purchaser. A notice of lis pendens must appear of record. Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 149. This statute does not give new rights to the plaintiff, but limits rights which he had before by requiring, for the purpose of giving constructive notice, not only a suit, but the filing of a notice of it. Richardson v. White, 18 Cal. 102. If, therefore, the filing of the lis pendens is the only constructive notice which can be given of the pendency of the suit, it is clear that the operation of the lis pendens, as constructive notice, cannot be made to depend upon the fact that the deed of a prior purchaser remained unrecorded, for that would be to import into the statute a term or condition not named in it. Several cases are cited by counsel for respondent Catlin from the reports of other states in support of their contention, and among them the case of Hoyt v. Jones, 31 Wis. 389, which seems to have been decided under a lis pendens statute essentially the same as ours. While this case supports respondent's contention, I cannot approve the conclusion reached by the court, nor the reasoning upon which it is based; reasoning which would be much more cogent if addressed to the question as to what the law should be. It is a significant fact, however, that after the decision of Hoyt v. Jones, supra, the Wisconsin statute, under which that case was decided, was amended so as to provide in terms that a party holding an unrecorded deed should be deemed a purchaser pendente lite. The other cases cited by counsel for respondent upon this point were decided under statutes essentially different from ours, and upon provisions directly relating to the effect of a failure to record deeds. These cases, so far as appears necessary, will be noticed in another connection.

The respondent Catlin, after the said deed from W. W. Brison was executed to him, notified plaintiff thereof, and demanded the rent, whereupon the plaintiff commenced this action against Harlow and Catlin, setting out the claim and source of title of each; that each of the defendants claimed to be entitled to the rent due from him, and paid the money into court; and required that they interplead, and that the money be paid to whichever party the court should direct. Defendant Catlin answered, admitting the facts alleged in the complaint; denied that Harlow was entitled to receive the rents; and alleged that he, Catlin, was entitled thereto. Defendant Harlow, in his answer, among other allegations, not necessary to be noticed at present, alleged that the title which he has, and had at the time he leased to the plaintiff, was derived by him under a deed from said Carrie M. Brison, dated September 15, 1886, but which was executed and delivered to him before the action of Brison vs. Brison was commenced, and before the filing of the lis pendens; "and that at the time of the commencement of said action of Brison vs. Brison, and at the time of the filing and recording of the said notice of the pendency of the action, he was the owner, in the possession, and entitled to the possession, of said land." The cause was tried by the court, and findings and judgment passed in favor of defendant Catlin, and defendant Harlow appealed upon the judgment roll. Appellant contends that respondent Catlin, not being a party to the lease under which the rent accrued, cannot recover rent, as such, unless he has in some way succeeded to the legal title held by appellant at the time the lease was given, or that in some way the conventional relation of landlord and tenant is shown to exist between Catlin and Warnock. It is undoubtedly true that Catlin could not maintain an action against Warnock for the rent, eo nomine, unless such relation existed. Emerson v. Weeks, 58 Cal. 439; Ramirez v. Murray, 5 Cal. 222. Whether he could recover the money voluntarily paid into court by the tenant as the rent stipulated in the lease executed by appellant, without being required to establish by proof the existence of such relation; or whether, such relation not existing, he would be required to resort to an action to recover the value of the use and occupation of the premises, if he were entitled thereto as between himself and appellant,—is a different question. Assuming that respondent Catlin is entitled to the value of the use and occupation of the premises, and that Warnock is, as to him, a trespasser, yet I see no reason why he may not avail himself of Warnock's admission that he owes the money to whichever of the claimants may be entitled to it, and, if entitled, recover it, as against Harlow, even though the actual value of the use and occupation may be more or less than the amount deposited; for, if appellant be not entitled to the money, it cannot concern him whether Catlin is receiving, and Warnock paying, more or less than the true value. It is obvious, however, that the decisive point in the case lies beyond the question above considered, and must first be determined. If the deeds of the respective parties were put in evidence, without anything more, appellant's title must have prevailed; and hence the burden was upon respondent to allege and prove some fact that would qualify or invalidate appellant's title. For this purpose respondent relied upon the plaintiff's averment of the judgment, erroneously supposing that appellant was bound thereby; while appellant could safely stand upon his deed, unaffected by the judgment against his grantor, until the good faith of his purchase should be attacked by averment and proof. Inasmuch as the findings expressly show that appellant's deed was acknowledged and delivered between 10 and 11 o'clock A. M., on September 15, 1886, and that the suit of Brison vs. Brison was commenced and the lis pendens filed about 4 o'clock P. M. of the same day, and no fact being alleged or found which would invalidate appellant's deed, or show that he held the property in trust for respondent Catlin, the judgment is not sustained by the findings. If anything were needed to confirm the correctness of this conclusion, it will be found in the conclusion of law drawn by the court from the findings of fact, viz., "that the defendant Harlow is concluded herein by said decree in the action of Brison vs. Brison."

Some other questions have been made in the very able and exhaustive briefs of counsel for each party, but which, in view of the conclusion reached, it is not necessary to consider. I advise that the judgment be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if so advised.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if so advised.

LONG v. CORONADO R. CO. (No. 14,738.)

INJURIES TO BRAKEMAN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a train man continues in the employ of the railroad company after full knowledge that the cars were defective in construction and the train force deficient in number, he assumes the risk arising therefrom, and cannot recover in an action for personal injuries caused thereby.

2. In an action by a brakeman for injuries received while coupling cars it appeared that it was dangerous to go between the cars because they had short drawheads and no bumpers, which was known to plaintiff, and that it was usual to make couplings by so placing the pin that it would fall into place when the cars came together, or by using a stick. At the time of the accident plaintiff went between the cars to be coupled, which were one foot apart, and at a point from which he could not see the engineer, and while adjusting the coupling pin the cars came together, and caught him between them. Held, that the injury resulted solely from plaintiff's carelessness.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

An action by Edgar E. Long against the Coronado Railroad Company to recover for personal injuries caused by defective cars and insufficient train force. From a judgment for plaintiff the defendant appealed. Reversed.

Works, Gibson & Titus, for appellant. Sprigg & Barber, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The action is to recover damages for personal injuries received while in defendant's employ as conductor and brakeman. The defendant owned what is called the "Belt Road," at San Diego, which included a short line from the Coronado Hotel to the ferry, a distance of about 1½ miles. The plaintiff had been in defendant's employ as conductor for several months. At first a brakeman had been employed. The brakeman was taken off the belt line—around the bay to Fifth street, San Diego—in July; and from the avenue line—from the hotel to the ferry—long before; when, it does not appear. Plaintiff left the employment in June, but returned in September. When he re-entered the employ he knew there was no brakeman, and that he was to be both conductor and brakeman. He was told that defendant would employ a brakeman "when times got better." The road did both a passenger and freight business, plaintiff acting as conductor and brakeman for both species of trains. The freight cars used by the defendant were short, four-wheeled cars, with no bumpers, and with stake staples projecting from the ends. The drawheads were scarcely longer than the depth of the staples. It was impossible to couple them by going between the cars. To do this they raised the link, and kept it in place by a block, and fixed the pin up so that it would easily drop into place, or, if it failed to do so from the jar, it could be touched with a stick and made to fall in. Plaintiff testified that he was perfectly familiar with all this; had frequently coupled the cars during his first employment, and was well aware of the danger. At the time of the accident there was occasion for haste. The engine, with two flat cars attached, loaded with railroad ties, stood on a curve, and was to be attached to a third car further back on the curve. Plaintiff, having adjusted the link and pin, stepped to the outside of the curve, and gave the signal to back, which was done. Plaintiff, seeing that the pin had fallen too soon, gave the signal to stop, and the cars were stopped, as he says, when about one foot from the third car. Plaintiff testified, however, that from this point he could not see the engineer. It would have been necessary to go around the car to do that, but he supposed the engineer would see him. At all events, the car stopped, and, being in a hurry, he jumped in to readjust the pin. As he did so the car moved again, and he was caught and injured. A jury was waived and the court found for plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly.

I do not see how this judgment can be maintained. Respondent's counsel admits that to go between these cars for the purpose of coupling them would be equivalent to an attempt to commit suicide. But he contends that plaintiff went there when the car was at rest, and there was an implied promise on the part of the engineer that the car would not be moved until he gave the signal. Even on this theory plaintiff could not recover, for then the cars must have been moved either through the carelessness or incompetency of a fellow servant. At the trial he withdrew the charge of incompetency. For injuries resulting from the carelessness of a fellow servant in the same general business, he cannot recover against the employer. Civil Code, § 1970. Plaintiff, however, contends that, since defendant was negligent in not providing suitable cars or a sufficient complement of men, it is responsible, although the negligence of a fellow servant contributed to the injury. The rule on this subject is announced in Martin v. Railroad Co., 94 Cal. 326, 29 Pac. Rep. 645. The question is, had defendant a right to believe, and did it believe, that plaintiff had waived his objections to the defects in the cars? His own testimony shows that he was thoroughly acquainted with the defects, and knew the extent of the danger, and that he contracted to do the work under these conditions. This is not a case where danger accrued or was increased after the employment. There was no conflict in the evidence, and no other conclusion can be drawn from it than that he knowingly assumed these risks by his contract. If he could not recover against the company because of the defective cars or insufficient complement of men, on the ground that he assumed the risk, nor because of the negligence of a fellow servant, it would necessarily follow that he cannot recover where both combine.

The cases cited by respondent are where injury resulted from some act or omission of the master, and it was sought to defend the master on the ground that the negligence of a fellow servant contributed to the injury. It is held that the fault of the master is not excused by the act of the fellow servant. But I think it plain that the accident resulted solely from plaintiff's carelessness. How he could assume that the engineer could see him when he could not see the engineer without going quite around the car, is not made manifest by the evidence. But, conceding the engineer did see his signal to stop, it is not explained how the engineer would understand anything else than that he had backed far enough to accomplish the coupling. How could the engineer know that it would make any difference if the car did move still further back? The presumption is that the engineer did not see the signal. As he could not, it was natural that he should move very slowly, and even stop occasionally; and, not feeling or hearing the shock of the cars meeting, or any word from plaintiff, that he should continue the movement. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

WELCH v. WILLIAMS, County Clerk.

(No. 15,195.)

Voters—Registration.

The Political Code provides that the qualified electors of counties may have their names registered at any time, and describes with great care and particularity the duties of electors and officers in relation thereto, and further provides (section 1094) that a great register shall be kept. Section 1094, as amended by Laws 1889, provides that upon the order of the board of supervisors a new registration may be made, and that such registration shall commence 100 days before a general election, and continue 85 days, when it shall cease. Held, that the board of supervisors may cancel the existing register, and order a new one, more than 100 days before a general election, and that the registry of a name in the new register, made at any time after the old register is canceled, and more than 15 days prior to the election, is lawful and valid.

In bank.

Petition for mandamus by H. H. Welch against A. C. Williams, clerk of Fresno county, to compel the clerk to enter the petitioner's name anew in the new register of county electors. Writ denied.

W. D. Tupper, for petitioner.

Beatty, C. J. The petitioner possesses all the qualifications of a voter of Fresno county, and prior to the 16th day of January, 1892, his name was enrolled upon the great register. At said date the board of supervisors made an order canceling the great register, and providing for a new and complete registration of the voters of said county, and the respondent immediately thereafter commenced making a new register. On the 17th of March following, the petitioner, upon his own application, and upon proper affidavit, had his name entered thereon. His attention having been subsequently called to the language of section 1094 of the Political Code, as amended in 1889, he concluded that such registration of his name—made, as it was, more than 100 days prior to the ensuing general election—was invalid, and therefore, within such 100 days, he applied to the respondent to register his name anew. This demand having been refused, he asks a peremptory mandate to enforce compliance.

The amended section, 1094, reads as follows: "A register, in which shall be entered the names of the qualified electors of each of the counties in the state, shall be kept at the office of the county clerk of such county, and in each of the cities and counties of the state such a register shall be kept in the office of the person charged with the registration of voters in such city or county. There shall be in each of the counties and cities and counties in the state (when required by the board of supervisors) a new and complete registration of the voters of such counties and cities and counties who are entitled thereto, and who apply with the proper proof. Such registration shall commence one hundred days before a general election, and shall continue for eighty-five days thence next ensuing, when such registration shall cease: provided, that nothing in this section shall be held to repeal any election or registration law applicable to or in force in the city and county of San Francisco." If our attention were confined exclusively to the language of this section, it might seem to require the construction for which the petitioner contends, viz., that when a new registry is ordered the work cannot lawfully be commenced more than 100 days prior to the ensuing general election. But for the purpose of construing a statute all its provisions must be considered together; they must be reconciled as far as possible, and particular provisions must be so construed as to promote, and not to defeat, the general purposes and policy of the law. The object of the registration law is to prevent illegal voting by providing in advance of election an authentic list of the qualified electors. Necessarily any efficient system of registration must involve a certain amount of inconvenience to voters, and probably, under the best system that could be devised, some qualified electors would lose their votes through inability to avail themselves of the opportunities, or to comply with the conditions of registration. The law should be so framed therefore, and, when its terms are doubtful, should be so construed, as to give the fullest opportunity to voters to procure the entry of their names upon the register that is consistent with reasonable precautions against fraudulent registration. The necessity of closing the registry some days prior to the election, and the danger involved in the registration of large numbers of persons during a short period immediately preceding its close, are apparent. But there does not seem to be any very weighty reason for narrowly limiting the beginning of the registry. On the contrary, it would seem to be better in every respect, not only with a view to the convenience and security of honest electors, but more especially for the purpose of challenging the right of such persons as may fraudulently procure their enrollment, to commence the registration as soon as practicable. The registry law seems to have been framed in conformity with these views. By its provisions the clerks and assessors of the respective counties were authorized to receive applications for registry, not at particular times, or during restricted periods, but at all times; and the names of such applicants as appeared to be entitled to vote were entered on the register as received by the clerk, or as returned from month to month by the assessor. At the same time that the register was being gradually completed by this process it was undergoing revision and correction by the cancellation of entries fraudulently procured, and of names of persons dying, removing from the county, convicted of crime, etc. By this means it was, or at least could be, constantly brought nearer and nearer a state of perfection, so that a copy of its uncanceled entries, made prior to any election, would furnish an accurate list of the persons entitled to vote thereat. But although the law, faithfully administered, would have produced this result, it is equally true that inattention or neglect on the part of electors and of the officers charged with the duty of purging the register might, and no doubt frequently did, leave it largely incumbered with names of persons who had ceased to be voters. To remedy this evil the supervisors were empowered, when necessary, to order a complete registration of the voters of the county. Such order, when made, was necessarily an abrogation or cancellation of the existing register, and rendered re-registration an essential condition of voting at the ensuing and all future elections. But such re-registration was conducted in precisely the same manner as the original registration. Application for registry could be made at any time, either to the clerk or to the assessor. Voters were not required to wait till any particular date after an order for re-registration before they could make their applications. The only limitation as to time was that imposed upon the board of supervisors by the provision requiring them to publish their order for re-registration not less than six months preceding the next ensuing general election.

Such was the general scheme of the registry law prior to the amendment of section 1094 of the Political Code, made in 1889, and certainly the system was far more convenient to the electors and far less expensive to the counties than it would be if registration were limited to a short period preceding each election. It also afforded a much better opportunity to investigate the right to vote of the persons enrolled, and to secure the cancellation of their registry where it could be shown that they were not entitled to the suffrage. Such, we repeat, was the registry law prior to the amendment of 1889, and the question is whether it was by that slovenly amendment to a single section completely changed in its whole tenor and texture. We do not think it was. The section, as amended, does not require the construction contended for, but, on the contrary, is easily susceptible of a construction which harmonizes with the unamended sections and the system of which they are a part. The requirement that registration, when a new registry is ordered, must commence 100 days before a general election, means that it must commence at least that soon, and the effect of the requirement is that the board of supervisors cannot cancel the old registry and order a new one less than 100 days before a general election. They cannot, in other words, deprive the voters of that period of time within which to secure registration. But there is nothing in this provision to prevent them from giving a longer time, which, by various other sections, they are directly and impliedly authorized to do. The only words of the amendment which seem to conflict with this construction are the following: "And shall continue for eighty-five days thence next ensuing, when such registration shall cease." It is very clear from this language that the legislature intended that registration should continue down to within 15 days of the election, and then (for the purposes of that election) cease; and it is argued that if registration commences more than 100 days before the election, and continues only 85 days thence (i. e., from the date of commencement) next ensuing, it will cease sooner than was intended. But this difficulty disappears if the statute is read as it must be read to get its true sense. If, instead of saying "such registration shall commence one hundred days," etc., it had said "such registration shall commence at least one hundred days before a general election, and continue for eighty-five days thence next ensuing," we should have seen at a glance that the 85 days during which registration must continue would commence, not necessarily with the commencement of the registration, but with the hundredth day before the election. This, although awkwardly expressed, is undoubtedly the meaning of the amendment; for otherwise the section as amended conflicts with and repeals numerous other sections, which it is impossible to suppose the legislature intended to sweep away without even mentioning them.

Our conclusion upon the whole matter is that the board of supervisors are prohibited by the amendment from canceling the existing register, and ordering a new registration less than 100 days preceding a general election. They cannot allow less, but they may allow more, than 100 days for re-registration, and it must cease 15 days before the election, (for the purposes of that election.) The registry of a name in the new register made at any time after the old register is canceled, and more than 15 days prior to the election, is lawful and valid. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that this opinion has no application to the special law governing the city and county of San Francisco. The writ of mandate is denied.

Municipal Ordinances—Reasonableness—Constitutional Law.

1. An ordinance of the city of Stockton, providing that the license for keeping a bar, saloon, or other place where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be $30 per quarter, except that when in such places a female acts as bartender, actress, dancer, singer, etc., the license shall be $150 per month, is not unfair or unreasonable.

2. Such an ordinance does not violate Const. art. 20, § 18, providing that "no person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business vocation or profession."

In bank.

Habeas corpus for the release of M. Felchin, imprisoned on a charge of violating an ordinance of the city of Stockton. Petition denied, and prisoner remanded.

Nutter & De Vries, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

Beatty, C. J. The petitioner was convicted of violating an ordinance of the city of Stockton, and sentenced to pay a fine, or, in default of payment, to be imprisoned in satisfaction thereof. He claims that his imprisonment is unlawful because the part of the ordinance which he is accused of violating is unreasonable, partial, unjust, and oppressive, and because it is in violation of section 18 of article 20 of the constitution, which reads as follows: "No person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession." The clauses of the ordinance in question are the following: "Sec. 7. License is required, and a rate of license is fixed and charged, for conducting, maintaining, engaging in, or carrying on any business, trade, calling, or profession, game, entertainment, or show, in this section hereinafter mentioned or specified, as follows: * * * Subd. 15. For each saloon, bar, barroom, dramshop, tippling house, or other place (except as in subdivision sixteen of this section mentioned) where intoxicating liquors, wines, ales, or beer are bought or sold, or sold in less quantities than one quart, or to be served, distributed, given away, drank, or used on the premises where sold, the sum of thirty dollars per quarter. Subd. 16. For each saloon, bar, barroom, dramshop, tippling house, or place where intoxicating liquors, wines, ale, or beer are bought or sold in less quantities than one quart, or to be served, distributed, given away, drank, or used on the premises where sold, in which any female acts in the capacity of a bartender, waiter, actress, dancer, singer, solicitor of custom, or servant, or plays upon any musical instrument, or is employed in any capacity whatever, either with or without compensation, the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars per month." The offense charged against the petitioner, and of which he was convicted, was the employing of females in a saloon where intoxicating liquors were sold in less quantities than one quart without the necessary license. There is nothing unfair, unreasonable, or arbitrary in the provisions of this ordinance. It is not open to any of the objections stated by Mr. Justice McKinstry to a similar ordinance of the city of San Francisco in his opinion in the Case of Maguire, 57 Cal. 610. If it is invalid for any reason, it is because the constitution means what it was held to mean in the opinion of Mr. Justice Thornton in the same case. The petitioner's argument, indeed, is substantially taken from that opinion, and the answer on the part of the city is, in sustance, the same as the view expressed by Justice McKinstry as to the power remaining in the legislature to regulate the employment of women. We are of the opinion that this view is a sound one, and that it subserves a wholesome public policy. The ordinance is a valid exercise of the police power vested in the municipal authorities.

The prisoner is remanded.

Ex parte NOBLE. (No. 20,931.)

Fines—Imprisonment until Payment—Jurisdiction of Justice.

1. Where one is convicted of selling liquor in violation of a county ordinance, a judgment that he pay a fine, and, if the fine is not paid "forthwith," that he be imprisoned in the county jail until the same be paid, in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every two dollars of the fine, is within Pen. Code, § 1446, providing that a judgment that defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine. De Haven, J., dissenting.

2. The judgment is not made void by the use of the word "forthwith."

Petition for habeas corpus by Noble. Petition denied.

R. Clough, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

McFarland, J. The petitioner was convicted in a justice's court of a misdemeanor in maintaining a place where intoxicating liquors were sold, in violation of an ordinance of Sutter county, and sentenced to pay a fine of $25, and to be imprisoned until it was paid, at the rate of $2 a day. An appeal was taken by petitioner to the superior court of said Sutter county, and the judgment was affirmed. The point, elaborately argued by counsel for petitioner, that the ordinance in question is "in conflict with general laws," and therefore void, was decided by this court adversely to petitioner's contention in Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 20, 15 Pac. Rep. 318. There is nothing in the point that the judgment is void because it provides for the payment of the fine "forthwith." Such a judgment would necessarily take effect forthwith, even though the latter word were not used. The judgment that petitioner pay a fine of $25, and, in case said fine is not paid forthwith, that he "be imprisoned in the county jail of Sutter county until the fine be paid in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every two dollars of the fine," is clearly within the provision of section 1446 of the Penal Code. The judgment is not invalid because it requires the peitioner to be imprisoned only at the rate of one day for every two dollars of the fine, while it might have made the rate one day for every dollar. Ex parte Soto, 88 Cal. 624, 26 Pac. Rep. 530. The point that petitioner should be discharged because the return of the sheriff does not show that the ordinance was properly published, etc., is not tenable. The sheriff was only required to return the commitment, which was a copy of the judgment. Whether the ordinance was published, whether there was proof of publication, and whether the ordinance was properly passed, etc., were mere questions of fact to be passed upon by the trial court; and the writ of habeas corpus is not intended as a means of retrying issues of fact, or of reviewing errors alleged to have been committed in the course of a legal trial. Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 420. If there were any such errors, petitioner had a remedy by appeal to the superior court; and as he did take such appeal, and the judgment was affirmed, it might be at least plausibly argued that we are now dealing with the judgment of a superior court. But, apart from that consideration, a justice's court has power to pass upon and conclusively determine facts upon which its jurisdiction, in part, depends. In re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 453; Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 162, 163, 19 Pac. Rep. 275. There is nothing in Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, to help petitioner's contention. It was merely held there that the court, on habeas corpus, could look into the complaint to see if it charged an offense under the ordinance there in question; but the court said: "We have assumed that the existence of the ordinances which, as claimed, gave the police court the appropriate jurisdiction, and the publication thereof, supposing the publication to be inquirable into by the court, were matters to be ascertained by the police court, and that on habeas corpus we ought not to go behind the finding of the police court with respect to such matters." Justices of the peace have jurisdiction to try misdemeanors such as that of which petitioner was convicted. Code Civil Proc. § 115. The prayer of the petition is denied, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the officer.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. Under section 1446 of the Penal Code, the justice of the peace, if he desired to enforce the collection of the fine imposed upon the petitioner by imprisonment, should have directed, in his judgment, that he be imprisoned in the county jail "until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine," instead of one day for "every two dollars of the fine." But this error of the justice in favor of the petitioner did not make the judgment which he gave wholly void. I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND upon the other points therein discussed.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — PLEADING AND PROOF—EXCUSE FOR NONPERFORMANCE.

1. In an action for breach of contract, defendants cannot introduce evidence of an extension of the time within which the contract was to be performed, or of a change in the place of performance, where their answer admits their nonperformance under the alleged modifications.

2. The fact that an unbridged river between defendants' residence and the place of performance was swollen by recent rains, and impassable at the time set for the performance of the contract, will not bring defendants' nonperformance within Civil Code, § 1511, providing that performance of an obligation will be excused "when it is prevented or delayed by an irresistible and superhuman cause," where it is not shown that such a condition of the river was unusual at that season of the year, and could not have been anticipated by ordinary prudence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by Ryan against Rogers and others to recover damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Putnam & Nichols and John J. Boyce, for appellants. Reinstein & Eisner and B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On June 4, 1889, the defendants entered into a written contract with Erlanger & Galinger, whereby they agreed to deliver to the latter, on or before November 30, 1889, at San Buenaventura, five car loads of choice lima beans of the crop of 1889, for the price of $2.70 per 100 pounds. The plaintiff is the assignee of Erlanger & Galinger. It is alleged in the complaint that defendants failed and refused to deliver the beans called for in the contract, or any part thereof, and this action is brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of this breach of the contract.

As one defense to the action, the defendants, in their answer, allege that the contract referred to in the complaint was afterwards modified in writing by changing the place for the delivery of said beans to Hueneme, and extending the time for such delivery until and including December 17, 1889; and in this connection the answer alleges that the defendants reside and do business in Santa Barbara, and that there is a regular daily communication between that place and Hueneme,—a portion of the way by stage, which crosses the Santa Clara river, an unbridged stream; and that on the 16th, 17th, and 18th days of December this river "was swollen by recent rains so that its passage was impossible; that said stream was unbridged, and at seasons of heavy rains it becomes for days wholly impassable;" and on the 16th day of December "the agent of defendants, thereunto duly authorized to deliver said beans in accordance with the terms of said contract, attempted to cross said stream, and reach said port of Hueneme, but was prevented from reaching the same upon that day or the following day by an irresistible and superhuman cause, and defendants sent another agent by sea to said port of Hueneme, who reached there at noon of December 18, 1889," and upon that day they offered to deliver the beans called for by contract, but the assignors of plaintiff refused to accept them. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found the terms of the contract to be as stated in the complaint, and that the time for the performance thereof had not been modified or extended as alleged in the answer; that defendants had failed to perform the contract, and plaintiff had thereby sustained damage in the sum of $900. Judgment was given for plaintiff upon the findings, and the defendants appeal.

1. Upon the trial the defendants offered to introduce in evidence certain telegrams and letters which passed between themselves and the assignors of plaintiff relative to an extension of time within which the defendants might deliver the beans referred to in the original contract. The first one necessary to notice bears date December 7, 1889, and is as follows: "To Rogers Bros.: If beans answering our contract are delivered according to its terms on December seventeenth at Ventura, we will accept them. ERLANGER & GALINGER." In answer to this, defendants wrote a letter to the attorneys of Erlanger & Galinger, in which they said they would deliver at Ventura if insisted upon, but wished that they might be allowed to make a delivery of the beans at Hueneme. In reply to this the defendants received the following telegram, dated at San Francisco, December 10, 1889: "To Rogers Bros.: A. Levy, of Hueneme, will accept the beans for us on December seventeenth, if in all respects according to contract. ERLANGER & GALINGER." On December 16th the defendants made reply to this as follows: "To Erlanger & Galinger: Our man goes to Hueneme, to deliver your beans, to-morrow." The court, upon the objection of plaintiff, excluded all this offered evidence, the objection being that the letters and telegrams were all dated after the time fixed for the performance of the original contract, "and the new proposition and extension * * * was without any consideration, and no rights could accrue thereunder to the defendants." The court did not, in view of the answer of the defendants, which admits their nonperformance of the new agreement, err in excluding this evidence. These telegrams were sufficient to show an agreement upon the part of the assignors of plaintiff to accept a delivery of the beans at another place and at a later date than that named in the original agreement, and, if the defendants had performed the new agreement, such performance would undoubtedly have operated as a satisfaction of the original contract, and thus have constituted a defense to an action for damages on account of the failure to perform it within the time limited by its terms. But, as there was no performance of the later agreement, the plaintiff was free to insist upon the damages which he had already sustained by the breach of the original contract before consenting to give the further time named in the telegrams.

2. It is claimed by defendants that they were prevented from performing the last contract within the time therein fixed by an irresistible and superhuman cause, and the alleged facts constituting such defense are set out in the answer, and the substance of which, so far as relates to this point, is given in the former part of this opinion. It is provided by section 1511 of the Civil Code that performance of an obligation is excused "when it is prevented or delayed by an irresistible and superhuman cause, * * * unless the parties have expressly agreed to the contrary." But the facts, as alleged in the answer, are not sufficient to show that defendants were prevented by an irresistible and superhuman cause from performing their contract, within the meaning of this section of the Civil Code. This court, in Fay v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 2̄5, 26 Pac. Rep. 1099, and 28 Pac. Rep. 943, said: "The words 'irresistible and superhuman cause' are equivalent in meaning to the phrase 'the act of God,' and refer to those natural causes, the effects of which cannot be prevented by the exercise of prudence, diligence, and care, and the use of those appliances which the situation of the party renders it reasonable that he should employ." And in the case of Dorman v. Ames, 12 Minn. 451, (Gil. 347,) the supreme court of that state say: "But an 'act of God,' in legal phraseology, means an accident against which ordinary skill and foresight is not expected to provide. This, applied to water courses, would include only floods or extraordinary freshets, and not such rises or high water in a stream as is usual and ordinary, and reasonably anticipated at particular periods of the year." It is apparent that the matters stated in the answer are not such as to bring the failure of the defendants to perform their contract within the protection of this rule. It does not appear that there was anything unusual for that season of the year in the rise of the waters referred to, and therefore that such rise was something which ordinary prudence might not have anticipated, and at the same time have taken proper steps to guard against any delay by reason thereof; nor is it alleged that defendants could not have reached Hueneme by another route, or that it was impossible for them to communicate with Hueneme, and direct the delivery to be made by some other agent; and without such averments the other facts alleged are not sufficient to show that performance of their contract was prevented by the "act of God." Williams v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 217; Eugster v. West, 35 La. Ann. 119. We find no error in the record.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

Ex parte SING LEE. (No. 20,930.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — POLICE REGULATIONS — CARRYING ON LAUNDRY BUSINESS.

Section 1 of a certain ordinance of the town of Chico provides that no person can carry on a laundry business in such town, except in certain blocks therein named, without obtaining a written permit from the board of trustees. Section 2 provides that the board of trustees shall grant no permit unless the person applying shall have obtained the written consent of a majority of the real property owners within the block wherein it is proposed to carry on such laundry business, and also of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block. Held, that such provisions were not police regulations, within Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws," and were unconstitutional.

In bank.

Petition by Sing Lee for writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted.

F. C. Lusk, for petitioner. Wm. H. Schooler and Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioner was, at the date of the issuance and service of the writ of habeas corpus herein, restrained of his liberty by the marshal of the town of Chico, upon a charge of having violated section 1 of a certain ordinance of that town, "in that he did * * * unlawfully establish, maintain, and carry on the business of a public laundry * * * without having first obtained a written permit from the board of trustees of said town to establish, maintain, and carry on such public laundry." It is claimed by the petitioner that the section of the ordinance which he is charged with violating is unconstitutional, and that, therefore, his imprisonment is illegal. For the purpose of passing upon the question thus presented, it is only necessary to consider sections 1 and 2 of the ordinance referred to. They are as follows: "Section 1. On and after the passage of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to establish, maintain, or carry on the business of a public laundry or public washhouse, where clothes or other articles are cleansed for hire, within the corporate limits of the town of Chico, except in block No. twenty-four (24) and block No. ninety-six (96) of said town, according to the official map thereof on file in the recorder's office of Butte county, Cal., without first having obtained a written permit from the board of trustees to establish, maintain, or carry on such public laundry or public washhouse. Sec. 2. No permit shall be granted by said board of trustees, unless the person or persons so applying for the same shall have first obtained the written consent of a majority of the real property owners within the block in which it is proposed to establish, maintain, or carry on such public laundry or public washhouse, and also of the four blocks immediately surrounding the block in which it is proposed to establish, maintain, or carry on such public laundry or public washhouse."

It is provided by section 11 of article 11 of the constitution of this state that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws;" and it is argued here in behalf of respondent that the ordinance in question is a police regulation, and therefore one which the town of Chico was authorized to enact by this section of the constitution. The power conferred upon cities and towns by the section just quoted is undoubtedly a very broad and comprehensive one, and would sustain the enactment of any ordinance having a reasonable tendency to promote the health, the comfort, safety, and welfare of the municipality, and which would not be in conflict with some general law of the state. But, broad as is this power, the ordinance before us cannot be considered as falling within the limits of its proper exercise.

The business of conducting a laundry is a lawful occupation, precisely as much so as is that of the carpenter, blacksmith, or merchant, and is not of itself, and irrespective of the manner in which it is conducted, offensive or dangerous to the health of those living within its vicinity; and no municipal corporation has the power to make the right of a person to follow this business at any place he may select for that purpose dependent upon the will of any number of citizens or property owners within its limits, as is attempted in the ordinance under review. A town or city may, when deemed necessary for the public health or safety, adopt reasonable regulations as to the manner in which such a business shall be conducted, and for this purpose may, in the exercise of its police power, impose reasonable restrictions as to the kind of building which may be used for such purposes, as, for instance, that it shall be of brick or stone in large and closely-built cities, and that it shall have sufficient drainage, and may prescribe within reasonable limits the hours during which the work of the laundry shall be suspended. Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 36, 2 Pac. Rep. 728; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730. Regulations such as these were held in the cases above cited to be merely police regulations, which any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers of such corporations may exercise with a view to promote the health and safety of the community. But the ordinance which the petitioner here is charged with violating is not of this character, and the restrictions which it imposes upon the right to carry on a public laundry have no tendency to promote the public health, or in any way to secure the public comfort or safety. The sections of the ordinance above quoted bear no kind of relation to such objects, and do not attempt to regulate the business mentioned with the view of accomplishing such ends, but they commit the right to carry on such business at all, in all but two blocks of the town, to the unrestricted will and caprice of a majority of the real property owners within the block within which it is proposed to establish such laundry, and of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block. Such a condition imposed upon the right of a person to maintain a public laundry is not only an unauthorized interference with the inalienable right of such person to engage in a lawful occupation, but also with the right of the owner of property to devote it to a lawful purpose. The personal liberty of the citizen and his rights of property cannot be thus invaded under the disguise of a police regulation. In re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98. In the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 373, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064, the supreme court of the United States had before it the question of the validity of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, which made it unlawful for any person to "carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco, without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone." This provision of the ordinance was in that case held void, as conferring upon the municipal authorities an arbitrary power to give or withhold consent to the carrying on of such business in buildings not made of brick or stone. In passing upon that question, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice MATTHEWS, said: "It does not prescribe a rule and conditions for the regulation of the use of property for laundry purposes, to which all similarly situated may conform. It allows without restriction the use for such purposes of buildings of brick or stone; but as to wooden buildings, constituting nearly all those in previous use, it divides the owners or occupants into two classes, not having respect to their personal character and qualifications for the business, nor the situation and nature and adaptation of the buildings themselves, but merely by an arbitrary line, on one side of which are those who are permitted to pursue their industry by the mere will and consent of the supervisors, and on the other those from whom this consent is withheld, at their mere will and pleasure. And both classes are alike only in this: that they are tenants at will, under the supervisors, of their means of living."

The ordinance now before us is not less illegal and arbitrary in its provisions, as it makes the right of the trustees to grant permission to carry on a laundry outside of the two blocks dependent entirely upon the consent of a certain number of property owners who are not accountable to any one for their action, and who are not required to give or have any other reason for their refusal to give such consent than their mere will. It is very clear to us that the right of an owner to use his property in the prosecution of a lawful business, and one that is recognized as necessary in all civilized communities, cannot be thus made to rest upon the caprice of a majority or any number of those owning property surrounding that which he desires to use. An ordinance in all respects similar to this was held unconstitutional in the Laundry Ordinance Case, 7 Sawy. 528, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, and it was there said by the court: "In the business of a laundry there is nothing objectionable that may not be urged against all occupations in the city and county. If, therefore, the supervisors can make its prosecution depend upon the approval of others in its neighborhood, they may require a similar approval for the prosecution of other business equally inoffensive. * * * Such a restriction upon the freedom of the pursuit of a lawful occupation is not authorized by any power vested in the board of supervisors, and it may be doubted whether it could be authorized by any legislative body under our form of government." There is a wide distinction between the ordinance in this case and that which was upheld by this court in Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 213, 24 Pac. Rep. 747. This ordinance deals with an occupation which is harmless in itself and useful to the community, while the other was sustained as a police regulation of a business in which the citizen has no inherent right to engage, but which may be prohibited altogether, or only permitted under such conditions and restrictions as will, in the judgment of the lawmaking power, limit to the utmost the evils which often attend it. Petitioner discharged.

MILLER et al. v. MILLER et al. (No. 14,109.)

TAX DEEDS—CONCLUSIVENESS—NOTICE TO OWNER.

Pol. Code, § 3786, provides that the matters recited in the certificate of tax sale shall be recited in the tax deed, and that such deed shall be prima facie evidence of certain matters specially named therein. Section 3787 provides that such deed, duly acknowledged, is conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings from the assessment, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed. Section 3785 provides that the purchaser of land sold for delinquent taxes must serve a certain notice on the owner 30 days before the expiration of the time for redemption, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, and that the owner, until such notice is given, shall have the right of redemption indefinitely. Held, that such a deed is not prima facie evidence that such notice has been served.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

An action by R. S. Miller and Carrie Miller against W. A. L. Miller and another to quiet plaintiffs' title to a certain lot of land acquired by a tax deed. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appealed. Judgment affirmed.

Chas. F. Burton and A. C. Freeman, for appellants. W. A. S. Nicholson, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title, and an appeal is before us from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions. Appellants introduced their tax deed in evidence and rested, insisting that such deed established a prima facie title in them. We are unable to see that respondents' evidence was material to the case in any degree, and consequently we have nothing before us for consideration upon the question of title save the tax deed of appellants. In viewing a tax deed from a common-law standpoint, the author of Blackwell on Tax Titles, at section 845, says: "This deed, according to the principles of the common law, is simply a link in the chain of the grantee's title. It does not ipso facto transfer the title of the owner as in grants from the government, or in deeds between man and man. The operative character of it depends upon the regularity of the anterior proceedings. The deed is not the title itself, nor even evidence of it. Its recitals bind no one. It creates no estoppel upon the former owner. No presumption arises, upon the mere production of the deed, that the facts upon which it is based had any existence." Such being the status of a tax deed at the common law, it is apparent that whatever dignity and value is attached to this deed, as evidence of title, is granted it by the statutory provisions of this state. Section 3786 of the Political Code declares that the matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed, and that such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is primary evidence (prima facie) of certain matters and proceedings, specially naming them. Section 3787 provides that "such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is (except as against actual fraud) conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed." These provisions of the statute are plain and explicit, and, in the absence of other and additional legislation, there would seem to be no question but that the production of a tax deed in evidence established a prima facie title. But several years subsequent to the foregoing legislation a statute was enacted, providing that "the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, or his assignee, must, 30 days previous to the expiration of the time for redemption, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, serve a notice upon the owner, stating certain matters, and further providing that the owner of the property shall have the right of redemption indefinitely, until such notice shall have been given," etc. It is now insisted by respondents that the service of this notice is a condition precedent to the execution of the deed, and, appellants having failed to prove such service, the deed was issued without authority, and therefore passed no title. An enactment, similar in principle to the one under investigation, is found in the statutes of New York, and also in the constitution of Illinois; and it has been uniformly held in those states that, in the absence of such notice, the deed was no evidence of title. Holbrook v. Fellows, 38 Ill. 440; Wilson v. McKenna, 52 Ill. 43; Williams v. Underhill, 58 Ill. 137; Blackw. Tax Titles, § 699. The service of this notice is not one of those matters established prima facie by the deed, under section 3786, supra, but it is insisted that under section 3787, supra, the deed ipso facto is made conclusive evidence of such service. If the authority of the officer to make the deed depends upon the service of a certain notice, it is very questionable whether the legislature has the power to declare that the deed shall be conclusive evidence that such notice was served, but we do not find it necessary to enter into a discussion of that question.

As already suggested, this enactment of the legislature, requiring this notice to be served, etc., is of much more recent date than section 3787 of the Political Code; and it is very apparent, upon an inspection of these provisions, that the legislature never intended that it should come within the purview of that section. It certainly should not be held by this court to be embraced within the rules of evidence there provided, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, for the section is severe and rigid in its operation. The words "conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings," as used in the section, refer, and were intended by the framers of the provision to refer, to the acts and proceedings required to be done and had at the hands of the public officials intrusted with the various steps leading up to the execution of a tax deed, and not, as in this case, to something required to be done by the applicant for the deed. This is the construction placed upon a very similar provision by the supreme court of Iowa, and is undoubtedly the true one: "But it is said that the same section provides that the deed shall be conclusive evidence 'that all things whatsoever required by law to make a good and valid sale, and to vest the title in the purchaser, were done, except in regard to the points named in this section wherein the deed shall be presumptive evidence only;' and that the deed is not made presumptive evidence of the notice of expiration of the time of redemption, and, as that is necessary to vest title in the purchaser, the deed must, under the provision, be regarded as conclusive evidence of it. This provision is found in subdivision 3 of the section in question, which purports to treat of the prerequisites to be complied with by the officers having any part in the transaction relating to or effecting the title conveyed. We think it does not extend further. The giving of notice of the expiration of the time of redemption is something to be done by the holder of the tax certificate. The statute went very far in making the deed conclusive evidence that the prerequisites to be complied with by the officers had been complied with; yet the officers were elected for the purpose of doing the things constituting the prerequisites, and are wholly disinterested. We cannot think that the statute designed to allow the holder of the tax deed to rely upon it as conclusive evidence of the things to be done by himself. The effect of the statute requiring notice to be given of the expiration of the time of redemption is to lull property owners into security. If a tax deed is conclusive evidence of notice, where there is no notice, the provision constitutes a most dangerous trap, instead of a protection to property owners." Reed v. Thompson, 56 Iowa, 455, 9 N. W. Rep. 331, approved in Wilson v. Crafts, 56 Iowa, 450, 9 N. W. Rep. 333.

The authorities in this state, indirectly at least, hold that the tax deed is not conclusive evidence as to these matters. In Landregan v. Peppin, 86 Cal. 126, 24 Pac. Rep. 859, the deed was declared void because the recitals, upon this question of notice therein contained, showed that the law had not been followed in that regard. Now, if the deed ipso facto was conclusive evidence that the proper notice was given, any recitals therein showing to the contrary were of no avail, for, if conclusive, the matter was foreclosed from investigation; and it follows that the court, in order to give weight to these recitals of the deed, necessarily held that the statute did not conclude and bar an investigation as to the merits of the notice. In Hughes v. Cannedy, 92 Cal. 386, 28 Pac. Rep. 573, the deed was declared void because the notice posted upon the land was fatally defective. If the deed was conclusive as to the sufficiency of the notice, this decision of the court could not be supported. It is also intimated, in Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 399, 29 Pac. Rep. 58, that section 3787 of the Political Code has no reference to this matter. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SLIGHT v. PATTON et al. (No. 14,909.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 21, 1892.)

Enforcement of Mechanic's Lien—Pleading—Notice of Claim.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1187, prescribing what a notice of claim of mechanic's lien shall contain, a statement of the date of completion of the work not being required, a mistake in stating such date will not affect the lien where the complaint in an action to enforce such a lien alleges that the notice was, in fact, filed within 30 days after the completion of the work.

2. Where a notice of claim of mechanic's lien by a subcontractor is made a part of the complaint, it is not open to a general demurrer on the ground that such notice fails to set out the plans and specifications of the original contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Action by George Slight against G. S. Patton and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment entered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daggett, Brown & Adams, for appellant. N. O. Bradley, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a mechanic's lien. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff having declined to amend his complaint, judgment was rendered in favor of defendants. The plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contends that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to his complaint. The complaint shows that plaintiff was a subcontractor with Thompson & Gamble, who were the original contractors with the defendant Patton, to build and paint for the latter on his land a house and barn and certain other structures, and to furnish all the materials therefor, for the gross sum of $5,775, payable on the completion and acceptance of said buildings and structures, or within 10 days thereafter; that no part of this original contract price was made payable 35 days after the completion of the contract; that the work was commenced by the original contractors on or about the 20th day of July, 1889, and completed November 20, 1889, and that neither said original contract, nor any note or memorandum thereof, was ever filed in the office of the county recorder in the county in which said structures were to be built. And further avers that after the original contractors had commenced the erection of said buildings, to wit, on or about August 30, 1889, plaintiff entered into a contract with them whereby it was agreed that he should do all the painting of said buildings and furnish all the materials therefor, according to the plans and specifications of said buildings, for the sum of $541.70, to be paid within a reasonable time after the completion of such painting; and that plaintiff duly performed his contract with the original contractors to paint said buildings, and completed the same on the 20th day of November, 1889, on which day said buildings and structures were finished and completed. The complaint then proceeds to state the filing and recording of plaintiff's notice of lien within 30 days after the completion of said buildings and structures, a copy of which notice is exhibited as a part of the complaint. In considering the objections to the complaint, a more particular statement of those portions of it alleged to be insufficient will be made.

1. The notice of plaintiff's claim of lien, which was filed on December 18, 1889, contains the following statement: "Said contract [subcontract] has been fully performed on the part of said George Slight, and the same was completed and the work and materials furnished for said buildings or structures, finished on the 20th day of August, 1889, and thirty days have not elapsed since the same was completed, and said buildings or structures finished." Counsel for respondents contends that this statement shows that the notice of lien was not filed within 30 days after the buildings were completed, and, therefore, that no lien was created. It is true that if the buildings were completed on August 20th, the filing of the notice of lien, on the 18th day of December following, was too late; but the notice also states that at the time it was filed 30 days had not elapsed since the buildings were completed; and further states, that plaintiff's subcontract to do the painting was made on or about August 30, 1889. As both of these statements are utterly inconsistent with the statement that the buildings were completed on August 20, 1889, and since the official date of the filing of the notice is December 18th, it is quite apparent that the statement that the buildings were completed on August 20th was a clerical mistake of writing the word "August" instead of "November;" and so it is alleged in the complaint. Phil. Mech. Liens, 331. But whether the mistake sufficiently appears on the face of the notice or not, plaintiff's lien, as against defendant Patton, is not affected thereby, if in fact the notice of lien was filed within 30 days after the buildings were completed, as alleged in the complaint; for it was not necessary that the notice of lien should have stated the date of the completion of the buildings. Section 1187, Code Civil Proc., prescribes what the notice shall state, and does not require that it shall state the date of the completion of the work or structures, nor even that the filing of the notice is within 30 days after the completion of the work. Harmon v. Ashmead, 68 Cal. 325, 9 Pac. Rep. 183; Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 146, 23 Pac. Rep. 139. No record, evidence, or notice of these facts is necessary to create the lien, although it is necessary that plaintiff allege and prove that the notice of lien was filed within 30 days after the completion of the building. It is so alleged in this case, and the defendants should have been required to answer the allegation. The complaint is also sufficient as against the defendant Hutchinson, who was joined as a party defendant by the usual allegations that "he has or claims to have some claim or lien upon said buildings and the land upon which they are situated, but such claim or lien is subsequent to and subject to the lien of plaintiff hereinbefore set out." By his demurrer, Hutchinson admits these allegations of the complaint to be true. If, therefore, the complaint is good as against Patton, it is necessarily good against Hutchinson.

2. That the notice of lien states the names of the persons by whom plaintiff was employed, and to whom he furnished materials, is too clear to admit of argument.

3. The only other objection urged against the complaint is that "the notice does not contain a sufficient statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract." As to this, the notice states that on or about the 30th of August, 1889, the plaintiff entered into a contract with Thompson & Gamble, the original contractors, under and by virtue of which he "was to perform certain labor and furnish certain materials therefor, and the following is a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract, to wit: To do all painting, staining, varnishing, and tinting, and all necessary materials to be furnished by said Slight, [plaintiff,] as specified in the plans and specifications of said buildings or structures, at and for the sum of $541.70 gold coin of the United States, no time specified for payments." The only specified objection to this is that it does not set forth the plans and specifications of the original contract in regard to the painting. It is not necessary to determine whether a special demurrer on this ground should have been sustained, as there was no such demurrer; but, as against a general demurrer, I think the complaint was sufficient in this respect. Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 150, 23 Pac. Rep. 139. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer, and proceed in the cause.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and proceed with the cause.

EATON v. BROWN et al., Election Commissioners. (No. 15,194.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—ELECTIONS—MARKING BALLOT WITH CROSS — PARTY DESIGNATIONS ON TICKET.

1. Pol. Code, §§ 1197, 1205, as amended by St. 1891, c. 130, provide that the names of all political parties which have filed certificates of nomination of candidates in accordance with the statutory requirements shall be printed, in separate lines, at the head of the official ballot, and that an elector who desires to vote any such party ticket straight may do so by putting a cross opposite the name of such party; but a ballot so marked shall not be counted, if marked in any other place, except to indicate a vote on a constitutional amendment or other question. Held, that such sections were unconstitutional, as resulting in the partial or total disenfranchisement of any elector so voting unless his party had a full state and local ticket.

2. There should be no party designation printed at the head of the official ballots.

3. Voters can only express their choice by placing a cross opposite each name or proposition voted for, except, in voting for presidential electors, the mark may be placed opposite the party group.

In bank.

Application by F. W. Eaton for a writ of mandamus to compel William A. Brown and others, board of election commissioners, to have the words "Citizens' Nonpartisan Ticket" printed at the top or head of the municipal ballots to be used at the coming election. Writ denied.

Charles J. Swift, for petitioner. H. L. Gear, for registrar. Dorn & Dorn and Maxwell & McEnerney, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. At its last session the legislature, by a series of amendments to the Political Code, ingrafted upon our election law the system of voting by means of what is popularly known as the "Reformed" or "Australian" ballot.[1] The main feature of the system is a uniform official ballot, printed and supplied by the proper public officers, containing the names of all candidates to be voted for, upon which the voter designates his choice by stamping a cross. In all cases this may be done by stamping the cross opposite the name of each candidate for whom the elector desires to cast his vote. But by a clause at the end of section 1197 it is provided as follows: "At the head of each ballot shall be printed, in separate lines, the names of all political parties which have filed certificates of nomination of candidates in accordance with sections one thousand one hundred and eighty-six and one thousand one hundred and eighty-seven of this Code, thus: 'Regular Republican Ticket,' (straight.) Opposite the name of each party, and on the same line therewith, there shall be a margin similar to that therein required to be left opposite the name of each candidate, in which the voter may place the mark in the manner specified in section one thousand two hundred and five of this Code,[2] if he desire to vote for all of the candidates of such party; but a ballot so marked shall not be counted, if it be stamped in any other place, except to indicate a vote or votes upon a constitutional amendment or other question." The petitioner in this case is one of the candidates of a party calling itself the "Citizens' Nonpartisan Party," which has nominated a list of candidates for county and local offices in the city and county of San Francisco. He claims that said party has complied with all the conditions entitling it to have printed at the head of the municipal ballots to be used at the approaching election in the city and county of San Francisco the words, "Citizens' Nonpartisan Ticket," as a party designation, by which it may be voted straight by stamping a cross opposite such heading. He has demanded of the defendants, who are respectively the registrar and the members of the board of election commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, that they cause the ballots to be used at said election to be so printed, and they have refused. He therefore seeks by this original proceeding to compel the defendants by mandamus to comply with his demand.

The argument of counsel has been principally devoted to the question whether or not the party by which the petitioner was nominated has shown that its proceedings bring it within the terms, or entitle it to the privilege conferred by, the provision above quoted. But the conclusion at which we have arrived renders a decision of these questions entirely unnecessary. We are of the opinion that this provision of the law is unconstitutional, and wholly void. It is an attempt to discriminate against classes of voters, and its effect, if allowed to be valid, would be to subject such classes to the alternative of partial disfranchisement, or to the casting of their votes upon more burdensome conditions than others, no better entitled under the fundamental law to the free and untrammeled exercise of the right of suffrage. The vital importance of the question involved would justify an extended and elaborate discussion of the grounds of our conclusion, but the extreme necessity of a speedy decision, in order to afford a sufficient opportunity to print the ballots, and to inform the electors of the proper mode of expressing their choice, compels us to rest content with the briefest statement of our views. It is a well-known fact, illustrated by the history of the party which the petitioner represents, that there are parties having merely local existence,—parties, that is to say, which, upon some local issue affecting a single county or a few counties, poll in such county or counties at least 3 per cent. of the votes cast at a given election, or can secure the signatures of 5 per cent. to a petition, but have no existence elsewhere in the state. There are other parties, perhaps, which at an election will cast 3 per cent. of all the votes cast in the entire state, but in many counties will cast a smaller percentage of the votes. In the case first supposed, the party casting 3 per cent. of the vote in a county at one election could at the next election, upon any construction of the law, nominate by a convention a full county ticket, could certify it, and secure a ballot heading by party designation, but such designation would not apply to any candidate for a state or district office, such as presidential electors or members of congress. The result of having a party designation at the head of the ticket would be, therefore, to disfranchise every voter who made use of it as to all state and district officers, or, if he attempted to supplement his straight ticket by stamping his choice for individual candidates for such offices, he would be disfranchised altogether, for, under the law, his ballot could not be counted. The ticket heading in such case could do the voters of a party no possible good, but would simply be a lure by which they could be, and in many instances would be, entrapped into a loss of their votes. In the second case supposed, all the ballots used in the state would have a party heading, but in many of the counties the party would have no local ticket, and in all such counties the voter stamping the heading would vote for state officers only, and would be disfranchised as to all district and county offices, or, if he attempted specially to designate his choice for such offices, his vote would be wholly lost. Such being the results inevitably flowing from the operation of this provision of the law, if allowed to be operative, it can readily be seen that it would be no benefit to any party to allow it a ticket heading unless it had a full state and local ticket, for no voter of the party could express his choice by stamping the party designation without partial or total disfranchisement. His supposed advantage would be but a delusion and a snare. Even in San Francisco, at the approaching election, if, as is said to be the case, the Nonpartisans have nominated candidates for the legislature, and if, according to the official opinion of the attorney general, the names of such candidates are to be printed on the general or state ticket along with the names of candidates for congress and for presidential electors, it would be just as much the duty of the defendants to put the party designation on the general as on the local ticket; and the necessary result would be that every supporter of the party who should thus be misled into voting a straight ticket would lose his vote for member of congress and for presidential electors. I imagine the supporters of the movement would scarcely desire the privilege of a party heading at such a price.

[2] Pol. Code, § 1205, as amended by St. 1891, c. 130, provides that "any elector who desires to vote for an entire party ticket may mark a cross * * * against the political designation of such party, and shall then be deemed to have voted for all persons nominated by such party."

Upon these grounds we hold that this provision destroys the just and equal and uniform operation which in an election law, of all others, is demanded, no less by the express terms of our fundamental law than by the genius and spirit of our institutions. It is therefore void and inoperative. There should be no party designations printed at the head of the tickets, because there can be no voting by stamping such designation. Voters can only express their choice by placing a stamp opposite the name of their candidate for each office, or by writing the name of a candidate in the blank space left therefor, or their answer to each question or proposition or proposed amendment to the constitution, except only in case of presidential electors, who may, under the law, be voted for in groups by a single impression of the stamp. Since this is the only mode by which a voter can express his choice, the printing of a party designation at the head of the ticket could do no good, but only harm, by misleading some voters, and causing them to lose their votes. The officers charged with the preparation of the official ballots should therefore be careful to omit the printing of such headings, and the voters should be thoroughly instructed to express their choice in the manner herein indicated. It will be understood, of course, that we do not hold the new law unconstitutional, except as to the single provision under discussion. In other respects, so far as we are at present advised, it may be fully carried out.

The writ of mandate is denied.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

GAROUTTE, J., (concurring.) It is very apparent from the reading of section 1197 of the act under consideration, in connection with the sections to which it refers, that in both spirit and letter it was intended that only parties polling 3 per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last general election should have a heading upon the ticket. Such being the fact, to my mind the law is clearly unconstitutional, in this: that it discriminates in favor of certain parties, and is therefore lacking in that uniformity of operation demanded by the constitution of this state. I concur in the judgment.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE.

GEORGESON v. CONSUMERS' LUMBER CO., (BUHNE, Intervener.) (No. 14,649.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1892.)

SHERIFF'S SALE—WHEN SET ASIDE.

In a proceeding by a judgment defendant to set aside a sheriff's sale it appeared that 600,000 feet of lumber belonging to the execution defendant were sold to claimant for $700, and that the sale was made in lump for a grossly inadequate sum. Held, that the sale was properly set aside.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Proceeding by the Consumers' Lumber Company to set aside a sheriff's sale on execution issued on a judgment in favor of Georgeson against said company, in which proceeding Buhne, Jr., intervened, and claimed the property as purchaser under the sale. From an order setting the sale aside, plaintiff, Georgeson, appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Sevier and Coonan & Sevier, (Horace L. Smith, of counsel,) for appellant. J. W. Turner, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant in the court below for the sum of $1,034.58. Thereafter an execution was regularly issued on the judgment, and levied upon 600,000 feet of lumber belonging to the defendant. The lumber was sold by the sheriff to the intervener, Buhne, Jr., on May 20, 1891, for the sum of $700. This is an appeal from an order vacating and setting aside the sale referred to. The court below evidently believed that the sale was improperly made in lump and for a grossly inadequate sum, and there is abundant evidence to show that such were the facts. Indeed, the court would have abused its discretion, we think, if upon the evidence before it the motion to vacate the sale had been denied. Hudepohl v. Mining Co., 94 Cal. 588, 29 Pac. Rep. 1025, cited by appellant, is not in point. That was an action in equity to set aside a sale of several disconnected parcels of land which had been sold en masse. The defendant therein was a vendee of the original purchaser without notice of any irregularity. There was nothing to show that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale if the property had been sold in parcels, or that a sale of less than the whole tract would have brought sufficient to satisfy the writ. A number of technical objections were made in the court below, and the rulings of the court thereon are urged here as error. It is sufficient to say that there is no merit in any of the objections.

The order is affirmed.

JONES v. CHALFANT et al. (No. 14,290.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1892.)

EJECTMENT—INSTRUCTION ON EVIDENCE—DISMISSAL OF VERDICT FOR WANT OF JUDGMENT.

1. In ejectment, plaintiff showed title by patent from the government, and defendant's title was a sheriff's deed on foreclosure of a mortgage given by plaintiff prior to receiving his patent. Plaintiff did not attack the foreclosure proceedings, nor object to their admission in evidence. In instructing the jury, after stating the evidence, the court directed a verdict for defendant, "if these facts all appear" as stated. Held, that by thus instructing the jury there was no violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, which provides that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."

2. Code Civil Proc. § 581, provides that an action may be dismissed, or judgment of nonsuit entered, "when, after verdict or final submission, the party entitled to judgment neglects to demand and have the same entered for more than six months." Held, that where defendant, on receiving a verdict, prepared a draft of judgment, and requested the clerk to make the entry, the verdict should not be dismissed, though the clerk neglected for more than six months to enter the same.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge.

Thomas H. Bond, for appellant. T. L. Carothers, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of 160 acres of land in Mendocino county. The case was tried before a jury on June 15, 1889, and on that day a verdict was returned and entered in favor of the defendants. Immediately after the entry of the verdict, the defendants' attorney prepared the draft of a judgment, and handed it to the clerk of the court, with a request that he enter the same. The court did not order the case to be reserved for argument or further consideration, or grant a stay of proceedings, but the clerk failed to enter the judgment until September 12, 1890. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on a prepared statement of the case, and his motion was denied on April 26, 1890. On September 3, 1890, the plaintiff gave notice to defendants that he would move the court to set aside the verdict and decision on the ground that no judgment had been entered in the case, and defendants had neglected to demand and have judgment entered therein for more than six months after they were entitled thereto. This motion was heard by the court, and denied, on September 12, 1890, and an order was then made directing the clerk to enter the judgment, and he accordingly did enter it on the same day; to all of which the plaintiff duly excepted. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion to set aside the verdict.

The facts shown by the bill of exceptions are, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff, to show title in himself, introduced in evidence a patent from the United States, granting to him the demanded premises, dated April 9, 1881. The defendants then, to show that the title had passed from the plaintiff, and was vested in one of themselves, introduced evidence showing that the plaintiff and his wife mortgaged the land described in the patent to one Aaron Chalfant, to secure payment of a promissory note, on July 23, 1874; that the mortgage contained the words "grant, bargain, and sell;" that the note and the mortgage were duly assigned by Aaron Chalfant to John E. Chalfant, one of the defendants; that afterwards the mortgage was duly foreclosed by John E. Chalfant, and, under an order of sale issued in pursuance of the decree, the property was sold to him by the sheriff of the county; that there was no redemption from the sale, and afterwards, on March 20, 1883, the sheriff executed and delivered to the purchaser his deed of the property; and it was admitted that under a writ of assistance issued in the foreclosure case the plaintiff was ejected from the land by the sheriff. Upon these facts the case was submitted. The plaintiff requested the court to give to the jury a certain instruction, which it refused, and said: "I shall instruct this jury to find for the defendants." The court then stated the evidence to the jury, and concluded by saying: "If these facts all appear to your minds as I have stated them, then your verdict will be for the defendants in this case. Swear an officer. You need not retire unless you want to appoint one of your members foreman."

1. Appellant contends that the court, by its instructions, violated section 19 of article 6 of the constitution, and for that reason the judgment should be reversed. The section referred to provides: "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." There is nothing in the record to show that the plaintiff in the court below objected to the foreclosure proceedings, or in any way attacked their regularity, or asserted their insufficiency to pass the title to the property to the purchaser. Nor is there here any such objection. It is true that the mortgage antedated the patent, but it purported to mortgage the property in fee, and in such case it is well settled that the after-acquired title inures to the benefit of the mortgagee. Civil Code, § 2930; Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612; Kirkaldie v. Larrabee, 31 Cal. 455; Christy v. Dana, 42 Cal. 174; Association v. Viera, 48 Cal. 572; Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20; Orr v. Stewart, 67 Cal. 275, 7 Pac. Rep. 693. Under these circumstances, there was nothing to be determined in the case except a question of law, and the court was justified in telling the jury what the verdict should be.

2. The appellant also contends that the court erred in not granting his motion to set aside the verdict. Section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases: * * * (6) By the court, when, after verdict or final submission, the party entitled to judgment neglects to demand and have the same entered for more than six months." The plaintiff's motion was not a motion to dismiss the action, but, in effect, was a second motion for new trial. But, conceding that the motion might be made under the provision of the Code above quoted and relied upon, still that provision is not mandatory, and does not confer an absolute right to the dismissal. Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505, 29 Pac. Rep. 121. The defendants did not neglect to demand that the judgment be entered in proper time; and, while it does not appear that they paid or tendered to the clerk the fee for the entry, it does not appear that they did not do so. In view of the action of the court, it will be presumed, therefore, that the failure to enter the judgment was the result of the negligence of the clerk, and not of the defendants. It follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

WADE v. WADE. (No. 13,814.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—DESERTION—RIGHT TO MAINTENANCE—CONDONATION.

The act of a wife, in allowing the husband to return and cohabit with her, after she has obtained a decree for separate maintenance on the ground of desertion, amounts to condonation, although done under the impression that her refusal would furnish ground for divorce; and the maintenance, therefore, must be discontinued.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Application by Annie Wade against John C. Wade, her husband, for an order requiring defendant to show cause why a separate maintenance obtained by her should not be increased. Defendant asked that the maintenance be discontinued altogether, and appealed from an order refusing such discontinuance. Reversed.

W. R. Daingerfield, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. The parties are husband and wife. In 1884 plaintiff brought suit under section 137 of the Civil Code to obtain a decree for a separate maintenance, charging the defendant with desertion. She obtained a decree March 5, 1885, requiring defendant to permit her to continue to occupy her then residence, which was a house belonging to defendant, and awarding her $27.50 per month for her support. A few days after the decree was entered, to wit, as early as March 20, 1885, defendant returned to plaintiff, since which time the parties have cohabited together as husband and wife. August 14, 1889, upon the application of plaintiff, an order was obtained from the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, requiring defendant to show cause why the allowance should not be increased. The defendant appeared and made his showing in answer to the order, and, among his reasons why the allowance should not be increased, alleged "that ever since the month of September, 1885, said plaintiff and this defendant have lived together, occupying the same house and cohabiting together as husband and wife," and asks that the decree be vacated and set aside. It is claimed that the act alleged amounts to condonation. The parties seem agreed that, if there has been a condonation, the allowance should be discontinued. Whether the facts show a condonation is the point to be determined. It is claimed that she consented to matrimonial intercourse through a misapprehension of the law. She has a horror of divorce, and feared he would have a cause of action against her to obtain one, unless she consented. It is also claimed that, admittting that the acts of the plaintiff amount to condonation, still such condonation has been revoked, under section 121 of the Civil Code, by conjugal unkindness on the part of the defendant, which, though not amounting to a cause for divorce, is sufficiently habitual and gross to show the conditions were not accepted in good faith. Neither party seems to have had the slightest suspicion that the resumption of marital relations would have any effect upon the right of the wife to her monthly allowance, for the husband faithfully paid it month by month. If this constituted a mistake of law, it was mutual. But I think it did not amount to that. Plaintiff says she did not wish her husband to get a divorce, and consented to marital intercourse to prevent his having a good ground for a divorce. In this case she was not at all in error. It did have that effect, and it would seem from this that she at least fully understood the consequence of the act. But her willingness to restore conjugal relations resulted from the false impression that her refusal would furnish a ground for a divorce. Forgiveness is an amiable trait, and it is a pity that she simulated a virtue for a personal end, but the effect must be the same. Why she did not wish her husband to get a divorce is utterly immaterial. Suppose she had condoned her husband's offense under the mistaken impression that by so doing she could control his testamentary power over his property. It would have been a mistake, but not a mistake as to the effect of the act in restoring conjugal relations. In fact, as in this case, the mistaken policy itself would make more evident the intent to rehabilitate the marital relation. She exacted no conditions for the condonation, and, if she had, I think there was no evidence of habitual gross unkindness sufficient to show that the condonation had not been accepted in good faith. It was rude to call her a "judicial pauper," but the language imputed nothing beyond the fact that he was paying a forced allowance for her support. That he was not sociable, and did not always eat with her, cannot, under the circumstances, be called gross unkindness. I think the order should be reversed, and the court directed to enter an order discontinuing the separate maintenance.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter an order discontinuing the separate allowance.

STARK v. WELLMAN. (No. 14,896.)

CAUSES OF ACTION—MISJOINDER—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

1. A complaint in the first count stated that plaintiff delivered to defendant, at his special instance and request, a package containing $650 in coin, in consideration of which defendant agreed to take due and proper care of it, and to redeliver the same to plaintiff on demand, which he had failed to do, through his gross carelessness and misconduct. In the second count it stated that on a day named plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of a certain package of coin worth $650, which, being in defendant's possession, he converted to his own use. Held, that the cause of action in the first count was for a breach of contract, and therefore improperly joined with the cause of action founded on a tort in the second count, under Code Civil Proc. § 427, providing that causes of action so united must all belong to one only of these classes.

2. In such case prejudice will be presumed, since such joinder is expressly forbidden by statute, and it does not affirmatively appear that no injury was done thereby.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Herman Stark against Charles Wellman on contract and for the conversion of money. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Wilson, for appellant. J. F. Coonan and D. Sevier, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This case presents only the question whether different causes of action have been improperly united in a complaint. It consists of two counts or separate statements of two causes of action. The first charges that plaintiff delivered to defendant, at his special instance and request, a package containing $650 in coin, in consideration of which defendant undertook and agreed to take due and proper care of it, and to redeliver the same to plaintiff on demand; that defendant did not take due and proper care of said package, but so carelessly conducted himself with respect thereto that it was lost through his gross carelessness, negligence, and improper conduct, and that he failed to redeliver the same on demand; wherefore plaintiff demanded judgment for damages. In the second cause of action it is averred that on a day named plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of a certain package of coin, worth $650, which, being in the possession of defendant, he converted to his own use, etc. A special demurrer was interposed to this complaint, specifically objecting to the joinder, on the ground that the first is a cause of action for the breach of a contract, and the second is founded upon a tort. Respondent contends that both sound in tort; that the first is for a breach of a duty imposed by law, and not for the violation of a contract obligation. This contention cannot be sustained. It is true, the owner of property injured by the tortious act of another may sue for the injury in tort, without noticing a contract with the wrongdoer, of which the wrongful act is a violation. Shear. & R. Neg. § 22. But there can be no question that he may sue for the breach of his contract, as was done in this case. The duty which the defendant is charged with having violated is expressly derived from the contract. The cause of action averred in the second count is a conversion of personal property. These two causes of action cannot be joined, under section 427, Code Civil Proc.,[1] and it was error for the court to overrule the demurrer interposed on that ground. Whether the error was prejudicial is the only question remaining.

It would be going a great way for this court to say that one is not injured by being sued in a mode not only not authorized, but, if he object, expressly forbidden, by the statute. How can we say that he may not be able more conveniently and successfully to defend a single action than two,—one for breach of contract, and the other for injuries resulting from a tort? The issues would be more simple. He would have fewer questions to try, and would know exactly what was required. The rule here, of course, is that the court must be able to see that injury has not resulted, not that we cannot see that injury has resulted. And, again, how can we know that defendant had no counterclaim arising upon some other contract? If he had, the count upon the tort would prevent its being set up. It does not appear that there was any such claim; but, as it could not be set up, it could not appear. And, as already said, the rule does not require that injury should be shown. That is presumed from error, unless the court can see that it could not have been injurious. It is suggested here that a set-off might have been set up against the count on the breach of contract. If it could be, necessarily complications would arise from the diversity of claims; and, in case of a verdict for a lump sum, it could not be known what cause of action was considered well founded or whether defendant would be entitled to set off his claim. The classification of causes of action which may be united under section 427, Code Civil Proc., while intended to be founded upon manifest reason, is nevertheless to some extent arbitrary, and differs materially from that which prevails in most states. In nearly all, for instance, causes of action arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, may be united. Had this been in our Code, it would have authorized the joinder of the causes of action in this case. It was in the Code from which it is supposed ours was copied, and, if so, was, of course, designedly omitted. This court may possibly think the rule which prevails elsewhere preferable, and that, if the lower courts follow such rule, no one would be injured; and thus section 427, Code Civil Proc., might be practically repealed under section 475. At the trial, plaintiff was permitted to amend the statement of his second cause of action by adding that the $650 claimed in that count was the identical $650 claimed in the first count. Although plaintiff announced that the amendment would be made, the amendment was not actually made until after the verdict and the entry of judgment. This is assigned as error, and the ruling is brought here by a bill of exceptions. But here, I think, we can plainly see that the defendant was not injured, and the difference between this case and the one first stated happily illustrates the rule by which to determine whether an error was prejudicial. In regard to the first, there may be matters of which we are unadvised, and it may have affected the policy of the defense. Here we know that the proposed amendment did not and could not have benefited the plaintiff or injured the defendant. It did not change the character of the complaint in any respect. But, if its effect had been to help the complaint, the defendant still was not injured, for he tried his case with reference to it, and was not prejudiced by the fact that it was not reduced to writing until afterwards. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to sustain the demurrer.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 427: "The plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint, where they all arise out of (1) contracts, express or implied; (2) claims to recover specific real property, with or without damages for the withholding thereof, or for waste committed thereon, and the rents and profits of the same; (3) claims to recover specific personal property, with or without damages for the withholding thereof; (4) claims against a trustee by virtue of a contract, or by operation of law; (5) injuries to character; (6) injuries to person; (7) injuries to property. The causes of action so united must all belong to one only of these classes. * * *"

GOODSELL v. ASHWORTH et al. (No. 14,477.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—IMPROPER CONSTRUCTION OF SEWER — ACTION ON BOND OF STREET SUPERINTENDENT.

Under Street Law, § 22, (St. 1885, p. 160,) providing that the superintendent of streets shall give bonds, on which, if he fails to see the laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations relative to streets or highways executed, after notice of violation thereof, he shall be liable to any one injured in person or property in consequence of his official neglect; and section 11, providing that all persons directly interested in any work provided for in the act, feeling aggrieved by any act or determination of the superintendent relative thereto, shall appeal to the city council, and further providing that all the decisions of the city council shall in certain respects be final,—the remedy of one complaining of the superintendent's neglect in not seeing that a sewer was properly constructed in accordance with specifications is not confined to appeal, and, there having been none, he can sue on the bond.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Edward R. Taylor, for appellant. John H. Durst, (Humphreys & Welch, of counsel,) for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action was brought on the official bond of defendant Ashworth, as superintendent of streets of San Francisco, for the purpose of recovering from him and his sureties damages alleged to have resulted to plaintiff by reason of the neglect of duty of said Ashworth in not seeing that a certain sewer was properly constructed in accordance with the specifications, and in making an assessment for the work, when he knew that the specifications under which the sewer was built had been violated in material respects. The bond, street contract, and specifications are all set out at length in the complaint, and the particular violations of duty specifically alleged, together with the manner in which the damage resulted to plaintiff. To the complaint a general demurrer was interposed, which was sustained by the court. Plaintiff declining to amend, a judgment was entered against him for costs, from which this appeal is taken.

The action is based upon section 22 of the street law, (St. 1885, p. 160,) which provides that the superintendent of streets "shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give bonds to the municipality, with such sureties, and file such bonds, as may be required by the city council, and, should he fail to see the laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations relative to the public streets or highways carried into execution after notice from any citizen of a violation thereof, he and his sureties shall be liable upon his official bond to any person injured in his person or property in consequence of said official neglect." Counsel for respondents contend that the demurrer was properly sustained on the ground that, if the work was not done according to the contract and specifications, the remedy of appellant was an appeal to the board of supervisors, (and the complaint fails to allege such appeal,) which remedy is given by section 11 of the act above cited. That section does provide that all persons directly interested in any work provided for in that act or in the assessment, feeling aggrieved by any act or determination of the superintendent in relation thereto, or who claim that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner, or having or making any objection to the correctness or legality of the assessment or other act, determination, or proceedings of the superintendent, shall, within a specified time, appeal to the city council, which, on such appeal, may remedy and correct any error or informality in the proceedings, and revise and correct any of the acts or determinations of the superintendent of streets relative to said work. It is further provided that "all the decisions and determinations of said city council, upon notice and hearing as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal under the provisions of this section, as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided." Appellant might have appealed to the board of supervisors, but did not; nor does it appear that any appeal was taken to said board by any one. Therefore there were no decisions and determinations of said board upon notice and hearing which could be final or conclusive upon all parties entitled to appeal. It is only where an appeal is taken that the decisions and determinations of the board are final and conclusive. Here there was no appeal, and no decisions or determinations of the board. The contention of respondents' counsel is that the remedy by appeal to the board of supervisors is exclusive, and that by failing to avail himself of that remedy appellant is without any remedy. The law does not say so. On the other hand, the same act that provides for an appeal to the board of supervisors gives the appellant a remedy by action upon the bond of the superintendent and his sureties. We must give, if we consistently can, force and effect to every clause of the act of the legislature; and, if the legislature has provided two remedies, and made neither of them exclusive, we know of no reason for holding that a party entitled to one or the other may not select either. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and allow defendants to file an answer thereto within 10 days after being notified that said demurrer has been overruled.

RICKS et al. v. LINDSAY. (No. 14,856.)

Findings by Court.

It being the duty of the court to find on all issues without any request, refusal to adopt a requested finding prepared by counsel is not error, the only thing necessary being that the findings cover all the issues and be sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by A. A. F. Ricks and others against N. G. Lindsay. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Weaver & Crowe, for appellants. J. N. Gillett, for respondent.

Belcher, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that the plaintiffs were the owners, as tenants in common, of a strip of land in the city of Eureka, described as a strip 15 feet wide, and extending from the southeast corner of Tenth and H streets southerly along the east side of H street 1,081 feet, and that on the 13th day of May, 1890, the defendant unlawfully entered upon the said strip, and took down and removed therefrom a fence placed thereon by plaintiffs, to their damage in the sum of $250, for which they prayed judgment. The answer of the defendant alleged that the said strip of land was and is a part of H street, an open public highway within the corporate limits of the city of Eureka, and that the plaintiffs had no right to the use, occupation, or possession of said strip, or any part thereof; that during all the times mentioned in the complaint defendant was the city marshal of said city, and that the common council thereof had power to regulate all streets in the city, of which H street was one; that on or about the 1st day of May, 1890, the plaintiffs unlawfully encroached upon and obstructed the said street by building the said fence thereon; that on the 6th day of May, 1890, the corporate authorities of the city passed an order or resolution directing defendant, as city marshal, to remove all obstructions on H street; and that defendant thereafter, acting under said order, and not otherwise, removed said fence from said strip quietly and peaceably, the same being a public nuisance. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and, after finding sundry probative facts, the court found as follows: "That the land described in plaintiffs' complaint is a portion of that part of H street lying between said Tenth and Fourteenth streets, and is a strip on the east side thereof, fifteen feet wide and 1,081.8 feet long. That in the month of April, 1890, plaintiffs inclosed said strip of land with a fence. But subsequently, and prior to the bringing of the action, the plaintiffs themselves tore down that portion of said fence erected between Tenth and Eleventh streets, leaving involved in this action only the fifteen feet extending from Eleventh to Fourteenth streets. That the defendant, acting as marshal of the city of Eureka and under the direction of the common council thereof, removed said fence from said strip of land lying between Eleventh and Thirteenth streets and from said H street. That defendant removed the same quietly and peaceably, and that said act of defendant in so removing the same is the alleged act of trespass complained of by the plaintiffs herein, and none other." And the court further found, as conclusions of law, as follows: "(1) That H street, from Tenth to Fourteenth streets as above set forth, is a public street for travel, seventy-five feet wide, for all persons having occasion to go that way on foot or with teams; (2) that the fence removed by defendant was an encroachment upon and an obstruction to said H street, and the defendant had the right to remove the same therefrom, and is entitled to a judgment for his costs herein expended." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action, and from that judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial they have appealed. The motion for new trial was made upon a bill of exceptions, which contains numerous specifications of errors in law committed by the court, but no specifications, or attempted specifications, of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the decision. Only one error in law is referred to in the brief of appellants, and we may assume, therefore, that the other alleged errors are waived. But, whether waived or not, it is enough to say of them that we think the rulings of the court were proper. The error relied upon is that the court refused to adopt a certain finding of facts which plaintiffs prepared and requested the court to make. It does not appear that any exception was taken to this refusal, but, conceding that the point can be made without an exception, still we see no error in the action of the court. Under our present system of practice, the court is bound to find upon all the issues without any request to do so, and the parties here have no right to dictate as to what findings shall be adopted. Requests for findings are therefore unnecessary, and it is not error to disregard them.

The only question is, do the findings cover all the issues, and are they sufficient? Pereira v. Smith, 79 Cal. 232, 21 Pac. Rep. 739. The only other point made for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the conclusions of law were not justified by the facts found. The point is argued upon the theory that it does not necessarily result, from the probative facts found, that the strip of land in controversy was a part of H street, and so dedicated to public use. We do not think this point can be sustained. The probative facts found do, in our opinion, plainly tend to show that the strip was a part of the street, and was dedicated to the use of the public. It is not, however, necessary to determine whether the conclusions drawn by the court necessarily result from these facts or not. The court, as we have seen, also found, as an ultimate fact, "that the land described in plaintiffs' complaint is a portion of that part of H street lying," etc. That finding evidently justifies the conclusions of the court, and, as it is not assailed, it must be accepted as true. It follows that the judgment cannot be reversed upon any of the grounds urged, and we therefore advise that it and the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

DARDEN v. CALLAGHAN. (No. 14,862.)

ACTION FOR CONVERSION—EVIDENCE—AGREEMENT TO SELL.

Where suit was brought for the conversion of goods sold to defendant, but which plaintiff claimed had previously been sold to him, and the evidence, instead of showing a sale to plaintiff, tended only to show an agreement to sell, and that the goods should remain with the seller until a certain time, and be paid for on or before delivery, an instruction giving the essentials of a contract of sale is improper, as the belief might thus be induced that, under such a contract, plaintiff would have sufficient title to maintain the suit.

Action by Daniel Boone Darden against Bartholomew Callaghan. From the judgment, and order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ford & Burnell, for appellant. J. W. Turner, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The action was to recover damages for the conversion of personal property, and was tried with the aid of a jury. Both parties claim to have purchased from one Dolly Edwards, who first sold or agreed to sell to plaintiff, and then to defendant. Whether the transaction with plaintiff was a sale or only an agreement to sell was an important issue in the case, for, if it were the latter only, he had not such a title as would enable him to maintain this action. The only evidence upon that subject is the testimony of the plaintiff himself. He says, in substance, that he deals in second-hand goods; that the vendor came to his place of business on January 2, 1891, and asked if he would buy her furniture. The same day (Friday) he called and made an inventory, and the next morning offered her $290 for it. She said she would let him know whether she would accept or not, and shortly after came, as he says, "and told me I could have the goods; that they were mine. I paid her $50 on the goods, and told her I would pay the balance that evening." He took a receipt for the money as follows: "Eureka, Cal., January 3, 1891. Received from D. S. Darden, on furniture, fifty dollars. Miss D. EDWARDS." She was going away, and wanted him to leave the goods there until Monday, so she could use the house, and save the expense of an hotel, and plaintiff consented. He testified: "Everything was placed as it would be fixed up in a house. The carpets were tacked down. The house was a two-story house, and both floors were furnished, including the halls. In the afternoon she came back to the store, and offered to return the $50. I was not present, and my clerk would not take it." On cross-examination he testified: "Question. The question I asked you was this: Are you positive that, according to your agreement, you were to pay her the balance of the money that evening, and leave the goods there until Monday? Answer. Yes, sir; I was." On the same day that the contract was made with the plaintiff, and before he had tendered the balance of the purchase money, defendant bought the goods, paid for them, and they were delivered to him.

It seems evident from plaintiff's testimony that the goods were not to be delivered to plaintiff until paid for. If defendant had not purchased, plaintiff would not have been entitled to demand the goods on Monday without having paid or offered to pay for them; and had they been destroyed by fire in the mean time, it seems equally plain that the loss would not have been his. If the price is to be paid before or on delivery, the title does not pass until payment is made. There was here neither delivery nor payment of the price. Blackwood v. Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. Rep. 248, and authorities there cited. There being no conflict in the evidence upon this subject, and no chance for construction, and both parties accepting the evidence as true, its effect, as constituting a sale or an agreement to sell, was a question of law for the court. The evidence did not tend to prove more than an agreement to sell. That would not confer title, without which plaintiff cannot maintain this suit. At the request of plaintiff, and over the objections of defendant, the court instructed the jury as to what was essential to a valid contract of sale, under the statute of frauds. Such an instruction was not pertinent to any issue in this case, and may have been prejudicial, as calculated to induce the jury to believe that a valid agreement for the purchase of the property would confer upon plaintiff sufficient title to maintain the action. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine any other purpose in giving it. I can imagine no circumstance which can justify such an instruction in a case of this character. I cannot see how the rule found in section 3294 of the Civil Code could be made applicable to this case, even had there been evidence tending to establish a sale to plaintiff, rather than a mere agreement to sell.

I think the verdict is against the evidence, and that the court erred in the respects mentioned, and that the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

PAIGE et al. v. ROEDING et al. (No. 13,738.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 25, 1892.)

APPEAL—JUDGMENT ROLL—REVIEW—AGENCY—WHEN EXISTS.

1. Where a court, after having rendered judgment in a certain cause, sets it aside and renders another judgment, both of which are presented on appeal by the opposing counsel as constituting the judgment roll, but without any showing by bill of exceptions or otherwise as to why the first judgment should not have been set aside, the second is the only one which can be considered as forming the roll.

2. The fact that a packing company designates, in a contract with certain parties to manufacture and ship to them certain canned goods, the particular person whom it intends putting in charge of its business as superintendent, does not relieve it from liability for the neglect or incompetency of such person, on the theory that he has thus become the agent of both parties.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Timothy Paige and others against Frederick Roeding and others. From a judgment rendered by the trial court, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for appellants. Rosenbaum & Scheeline, for respondents.

Garoutte, J. This was an action to recover certain sums of money from the defendants, Roeding, Perkins, and Richardson, as stockholders of the Wheeler Fruit Packing Company, a corporation. Plaintiffs appealed from the judgment rendered by the trial court, and the case is now before us, upon a judgment roll containing no bill of exceptions, but consisting simply of the pleadings, findings, and judgment. Subsequent to the filing of the transcript, respondents brought to this court another set of findings, and another judgment made and entered in the same cause several months prior to the filing of the findings and entry of the judgment found in the transcript, and now assert them to be the true findings and judgment, and ask that they be inserted in the transcript, as part of the judgment roll and in lieu of the judgment and findings now therein contained. Plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment set out in the transcript; and if that judgment constitutes no part of the judgment roll, but is to be displaced by this prior judgment, then this appeal must fail, for it will have no foundation upon which to rest.

This brings us to the question, what constitutes the judgment roll in this case? In other words, which one of the set of findings, and which one of these judgments, forms part of the judgment roll? for the statute clearly contemplates that there shall be but one judgment and one set of findings incorporated therein. Upon an appeal from a judgment, this court is not bound by the papers found in the transcript, which counsel claim constitute the judgment roll; neither is it foreclosed by the certificate of the clerk of the trial court that certain papers therein enumerated form the judgment roll. If opposing counsel contend that the judgment roll presented to this court is defective or lacking in material parts, he is entitled to bring such omitted documents, properly certified, before this court; and it then becomes the duty of the court to determine from all the record before it what constitutes the judgment roll in the case. The matter here to be determined presents but little difficulty,—we have nothing before us but the two judgments of the court, and the later, in point of time, must prevail, and, in the absence of some further showing by bill of exceptions or otherwise, must be deemed the true and final judgment in the case. As was said in Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 560, 27 Pac. Rep. 411: "If any matters could have been presented to the court below which would have authorized the entry of this judgment, it will be presumed on this appeal in support of the judgment that such matters were so presented, and that the judgment was entered in accordance therewith." In Parker v. Altschul, 60 Cal. 380, it is said: "All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of the proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction, and, as the consent of the defendants would have justified the order of the court, we must presume that such consent was given, there being nothing in the record to show that it was not." Circumstances may have arisen wherein the trial court would have been justified under the law in setting aside the first findings and judgment, and in filing the second findings and judgment, and with no showing to the contrary we must assume that such circumstances did arise. Under the present showing, the judgment in the transcript is as much a part of the judgment roll as the last amended complaint or answer would be a part of the judgment roll. This court would assume, in the absence of something to the contrary, that the last pleading filed was regularly filed, and should be the pleading incorporated as a part of the record. Upon an examination of the findings and conclusions of law set out in the transcript, it is apparent that they form the foundation for the judgment therein contained, and, such being the fact, they also are a part of the judgment roll. As already suggested, we find no bill of exceptions in the record, and it is only upon a bill of exceptions that we would be allowed to examine into the sufficiency of the reasons which moved the court to set aside and declare void its first judgment rendered in the case. Its order may have been erroneous, or it may have been entirely void, but the matter is not a proper subject of inquiry before us, not having been presented for review in any form authorized by the statute. See Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 426, 27 Pac. Rep. 306.

This was an action for damages, brought by the parties of the second part to a certain contract, against the stockholders of the Wheeler Fruit Packing Company, the party of the first part, and is based upon the alleged violation by said packing company of some of the covenants in the contract contained. One of the covenants entered into by said packing company was as follows: "The party of the first part agrees to furnish a superintendent in the person of Mr. Richard Wheeler, whose duty it will be to supervise the packing, preparing, cooking, and putting up the fruit preparatory to shipment, according to the Wheeler process." From the foregoing provision of the contract the court concluded, as matter of law, "that the effect of said contract was to make the said Wheeler the agent of plaintiffs as well as of said corporation, and that, therefore, plaintiffs are not entitled to recover of defendants the damage sustained by them by reason of the said carelessness and negligence of said Wheeler." The findings of fact and conclusions of law clearly indicate that Wheeler was incompetent and negligent in the conduct of the business, and that heavy losses were sustained to plaintiffs by reason thereof. We are satisfied that the conclusion of law by the court that Wheeler was the agent of both parties is erroneous, and it necessarily follows that its judgment upon the merits of the cause cannot be supported. Wheeler was not the agent of the plaintiffs, but he was the moving spirit, —the president of the corporation,—and was placed in charge of the business of the corporation under its covenant in the contract. It was the duty of the corporation, through Wheeler, under the contract, to superintend the cooking, and otherwise preparing, of this fruit for shipment, a duty which it failed to perform. Owing to the negligence and incompetency of Wheeler, the fruit was never in a condition for shipment. The court finds that it was spoiled. And the fact that the corporation designated in the contract the particular party whom it was intending to place in charge of the business of preparing this fruit is entirely immaterial. As counsel for appellants aptly suggest: "Let us suppose that Wheeler himself was the party to this contract, instead of the corporation, and covenanted that he would supervise the preparing of this fruit for shipment." Upon principle, the case would be identical with that at bar, yet such conditions would in no sense make him an agent for the other parties to the contract, and thus relieve him from all responsibility to them for neglect and incompetency in the performance of the duties which he agreed under the terms of the contract to perform. Again, if the corporation had agreed to furnish a superintendent, but had not named him in the contract, it was bound to furnish a competent superintendent; in other words, the negligence of the superintendent would be its negligence, and the responsibility for his acts would in no degree attach to the other parties to the contract. While the findings are probably sufficient to justify a judgment for appellants, yet the proceeding of the trial court took a somewhat novel course, and we think the interests of justice would be best subserved by simply reversing the judgment, and ordering a new trial of the cause. It is so ordered.

NICHOLSON v. GETCHELL. (No. 14,764.)

Nuisance—Bill for Injunction—Sufficiency.

A complaint to abate a nuisance, which alleges that defendant has constructed a breakwater in a stream which forms the common boundary between the parties, so that in time of freshets, which frequently occur, it throws the water with great force against plaintiff's land, and thus greatly damages it, is good on demurrer for want of equity.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Complaint for injunction by William Nicholson against Samuel Getchell. Defendant had judgment on demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. H. Salvage and Denver Sevier, for appellant. E. W. Wilson, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is from a judgment entered upon demurrer to the complaint, the plaintiff having declined to amend. The action is for a mandatory injunction to prevent defendant from maintaining a certain breakwater, which had already been built. Practically the action is to abate the breakwater as a nuisance. The demurrer is general, on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action. It is claimed that the complaint does not state facts which show probable damage, but only an opinion of the pleader that damage will ensue. It is averred that the parties own land on opposite sides of Jacoby creek, which is their common boundary; that the channel of the stream is about 60 feet wide, and makes a sharp curve into the land of plaintiff, and away from the land of defendant. On plaintiff's side of the stream, at the curve, the bank is abrupt, and the soil loose; while on the other side the bank slopes gently. The breakwater, or bulkhead, it is averred, consists of posts driven firmly into the ground 3 feet apart, and planked to the height of about 4 feet from the ground; the upper end resting against defendant's land, and extending down stream and out towards the center towards plaintiff's land, a distance of 100 feet, and is continued down the creek by a fence in the bed of the creek for about 10 rods, so that in the event of a rise in the waters of the creek the water will necessarily be turned against plaintiff's land. Jacoby creek is a mountain stream, carrying little water in the summer, but subject to sudden freshets, when it rises in a short time to a great height, falling rapidly when the storm abates. The breakwater is located on the inside of the sharp curve, and will inevitably throw the water, in case of freshet, with great force to the concave bank, and damage will inevitably ensue. The universal tendency is for a stream to wash from the bank on the outside of a curve, and to fill in the inside: and the effect of the breakwater described in the complaint must inevitably be greatly to increase this natural tendency. The facts being as alleged, there was no excuse for a bulkhead on defendant's bank. I think the complaint states facts showing that danger was probable and imminent, and therefore the demurrer should have been overruled.

A preventive injunction was not asked, and perhaps, as to some extent the effect of the breakwater must be matter of opinion, and the necessity for immediate relief not urgent, the facts would not have justified such interposition. The court would not interfere until after trial, but it is not necessary to show that injury is inevitable to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action. Such a rule as that proposed would prevent relief in a large class of cases where the interposition of a court is absolutely necessary to prevent great and irreparable injury. Even in plain cases it would seldom be possible to know that the injury was certain to occur. That it is very probable should be made to appear by the statement of facts from which the court will be able to conclude the injury probable. It seems to me that was done in this case. I think, therefore, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

ANDERSON v. DE URIOSTE. (No. 14,717.)

Sewer Contracts—Notice—Extension—Assignment.

1. Act March 18, 1885, being a general street law, and therefore, as to all matters provided, superseding the consolidation act, notice of intention to do work on the streets of San Francisco should be given according to the provisions of the former act, as amended by Act March 14, 1889.

2. Under the provision of section 6 of the street law, authorizing the superintendent of public streets to extend, "under the direction of the city council," the time fixed in a contract entered into by him, a resolution directing the extension of time to construct a brick sewer on a certain street, between certain other streets, warrants an extension by the superintendent of a contract for such work, though the resolution refers to the contract as made with a certain person other than the one with whom it was made.

3. Civil Code, § 1457, providing that the burden of an obligation may be transferred with the consent of the party entitled to its benefits, but not otherwise, does not prevent a contractor with a city assigning his contract so that the assignee, on completing it, may enforce it against the city; it merely prevents the contractor being relieved from his obligations without the consent of the city.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by C. L. Anderson against Adolph De Urioste. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment upon a lot on Oak street, in the city of San Francisco. The assessment was for the construction of a brick sewer with manholes, on Oak street, from the westerly line of Cole street to Baker street; and the complaint alleges that all the proceedings leading up to the assessment were duly had and taken under and in pursuance of an act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers, within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885, and an act amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, approved March 14, 1889. The defendant, by his answer, denied all the averments of the complaint, except that he was the owner of the lot assessed at all the times mentioned in the complaint.

The court below found all the averments of the complaint to be true, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed from the judgment, and has brought the case here on a bill of exceptions.

1. It is claimed by the appellant that the resolution of intention to do the work, passed by the board of supervisors, was not published for five successive days, as required by the consolidation act, before the final order was made, and hence that the board never acquired jurisdiction to make the order. The answer is that the act of March 18, 1885, was a general street law, and was in force in the city and county of San Francisco from the date of its passage. Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 74, 14 Pac. Rep. 615. It, therefore, as to all matters provided for, superseded the consolidation act, and became the governing law of the city. As amended in 1889, it authorized, among other things, steps to be taken for the construction of sewers in streets, and required that the resolution of intention to order the work to be done should be published and posted for two days only. This proceeding was commenced and carried on under the provisions of that act, and it is alleged and found that the resolution of intention was published and posted as required by it. The board acquired jurisdiction, therefore, to make the order that the work be done.

2. It is also claimed that the work was not completed within the time limited in the contract, and that the assessment was therefore void. The contract to construct the sewer was awarded to one J. J. O'Connor, and was executed by him and the superintendent of streets on April 14, 1890. It was indorsed, "Street contract

No. 756," and required that the work be commenced within 14 days, and completed within 90 days, after its date. On June 9, 1890, the board of supervisors passed a resolution numbered 3557, directing the superintendent of streets to grant "the following extensions of time on contracts for the performance of street work: * * * To O'Brien and Belser or assigns, ninety days on their contract to construct a brick sewer," etc., "in Oak street, from Baker to Cole street." On the next day the superintendent of streets attached to the contract an extension, as follows: "In accordance with resolution No. 3557, third series, passed the 9th day of June, 1980, I hereby grant and attach to street contract No. 756, for sewering," etc., "Oak street, from Cole to Baker street, ninety (90) days' additional time for the completion of said work, this 10th day of June, 1890. THOMAS ASHWORTH, Superintendent of Public Streets, Highways, and Squares." The street law authorized the superintendent to fix the time for the commencement and completion of the work under all contracts entered into by him, and to extend the time so fixed, "under the direction of the city council." Section 6. It is objected that the superintendent was not authorized to make the extension here, because in the resolution of the board O'Brien and Belser were named as the contractors, and not O'Connor. But the direction was to extend the time "to construct a brick sewer," etc., "on Oak street from Baker to Cole street," and the extension granted was to complete the contract to do that particular work. There was an error in the name of the contractor, but we do not think the error such a material one as would render the extension ineffectual. One of the maxims of the law is that "an error in the name is nothing when there is certainty as to the thing." Broome, Leg. Max. "Nihil facit error nominis," etc. In Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 214, 25 Pac. Rep. 351, it was held that, under the statute, a warrant signed by the superintendent of streets and countersigned by the mayor of the city must be attached to the assessment, and that the warrant and assessment must, in order to create a lien upon the property charged, be recorded, but that the omission in the record of "the name of the mayor and the designation of his office" was immaterial. And in Ede v. Knight, 93 Cal. 159, 28 Pac. Rep. 860, where the certificate of extension stated that the additional time was granted in accordance with a resolution passed on a certain day, giving it a wrong number, it was held that the error was immaterial.

3. On May 2, 1890, O'Connor assigned his contract to the plaintiff, and the latter proceeded to fully complete the work to be done under it within the time allowed therefor. It is claimed by appellant that the contract was not legally assigned, and hence that the plaintiff never acquired any rights under it. In support of this position, section 1457 of the Civil Code is cited. That section is as follows: "The burden of an obligation may be transferred with the consent of the party entitled to its benefits, but not otherwise, except as provided by section 1466." We find nothing in the record showing that the assignment was not consented to by the proper officers of the muncipality and by the defendant, but, assuming that it was not, the question is, was it inhibited and rendered void by the section cited?

In a note to the section, found in the annotated edition of the Code, by the Code commissioners, it is said: "It is not meant by this section to imply that a third person cannot assume the obligations of a contract between other parties, but only that he cannot relieve a party thereto from his obligations without the consent of the creditor." We think this the correct construction of the section, and it was in effect so held by this court in Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. Rep. 52. In Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241, the question was raised whether a contract to perform work on a street in San Francisco could be assigned, and it was held that it could, and that the assignee, if he fulfilled the conditions of the contract, could enforce it. That decision is, in our opinion, applicable to the facts of this case, and should be followed.

No other points are made in the case, and it follows from what has been said that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

EDWARDS v. ROLLEY. (No. 13,812.)

SWAMP LANDS—PATENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. The bed of what was once a navigable stream, but which had never been acquired as "swamp and overflowed" land from the United States, under Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, is not included under that designation in the statutes authorizing the sale of state lands.

2. A patent for land, the sale of which is unauthorized, may always be shown invalid by one holding adversely, although the title be that merely of naked possession. Fruit Land Co. v. Moir, 22 Pac. Rep. 55, and 23 Pac. Rep. 359, 83 Cal. 101, and Steel v. Smelting Co., 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389, 106 U. S. 447, followed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Carrie N. Edwards against Joseph Rolley. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. H. Chamberlin and Ernest Sevier, for appellant. S. M. Buck and H. L. Smith, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The action is brought to quiet title, and, the defendant being in possession, is therefore virtually an action to recover possession, sometimes called an action of ejectment. The defendant denied plaintiff's title, pleaded a former judgment as a bar, set up title in himself, and also claimed that the plaintiff's right of action was barred by the statute of limitations. The action was tried without a jury, and the findings seem to state the facts quite fully. The court found that neither plaintiff nor defendant had title to the demanded premises, and that plaintiff's right was not barred by the judgment pleaded, or by the statute of limitations, and defendant had judgment. The findings show that on the 28th of September, 1850, and prior thereto, the demanded premises were in the bed of Eel river, a navigable stream; that the land in that township was public land of the United States, and was surveyed by the land department by meandering both banks of the river, thus excluding the bed of the river from the survey. Defendant was the owner of a tract of land purchased from the state as lieu land, the application to purchase which was made November 22, 1858, at which time Eel river bounded it on the south and west; the land described in the complaint then being the bed of the stream bordering upon these lands. During the winter of 1861-62 the river suddenly changed its course, forming a new channel, and the water ceased to flow in the old channel. Each succeeding freshet brought down sediment, which filled up somewhat the original channel, forming the land in controversy. One John L. Pixley made application to purchase these lands from the state, as swamp and overflowed lands, June 14, 1886, upon which application a patent was issued October 17, 1888. Under this patent plaintiff claims title. The land in controversy then was the bed of a navigable stream until 1861. It was not acquired from the United States as swamp and overflowed land, under the act of September 28, 1850. Many sections of the Political Code show plainly that no other lands are included under the designation "swamp and overflowed" in the statutes authorizing the sale of state lands. This land was not swamp and overflowed land, within the meaning of those laws. Nor is there any other statute authorizing the sale of land of this character by the state officers.

It is said, however, that, admitting that the patent was issued in a case not authorized, still it is prima facie valid, and raises a presumption that the land had been properly segregated and listed to the state as swamp and overflowed land, and that all necessary steps had been taken to authorize the issuance of the patent. Easton v. O'Reilly, 63 Cal. 309.

It is further claimed that the defendant cannot attack the patent, unless he connects himself in some way with the original source of title. This last proposition unquestionably finds some support among the earlier decisions of this court, particularly in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295, in which the proposition is broadly asserted. On this point, however, that case has not been followed in the later cases. In Fruit Land Co. v. Moir, 83 Cal. 101, 22 Pac. Rep. 55, and 23 Pac. Rep. 359, the plaintiff claimed under a patent from the United States, and also a certificate of purchase from the state. The defendant had made application to purchase from the state, but it was contended that his application was void, because the land at the time was held adversely by another. This point was not deemed material, as the court found that plaintiff's patent and certificate were both issued without authority of law, and concluded as follows: "Each document was issued without authority of law, and is void against defendant, conceding that he showed no title except naked possession." Some members of the court doubted whether it was a proper case in which to apply this principle, but, so far as it holds that a patent may always be shown to be void by evidence that it was issued in a case not authorized by law, it is in exact accord with the cases in the federal courts. In Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, the true rule is declared in an opinion written by Judge FIELD. He says: "On the other hand, a patent may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation as a conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; that is, that the law did not provide for selling them, or that they had been reserved from sale or dedicated to special purposes, or had been previously transferred to others." And in Steel v. Smelting Co., 106 U. S. 447, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389, after declaring the conclusiveness of the patent as to all matters which the department officers were required to pass upon, the same judge says: "It need hardly be said that we are here speaking of a patent issued in a case where the land department had jurisdiction to act, the lands forming part of the public domain, and the law having provided for their sale. If they never were the property of the United States, or if no legislation authorized their sale, or if they had been previously disposed of or reserved from sale, the patent would be inoperative to pass the title, and objection to it could be taken on these grounds at any time, and in any form of action." Many other cases in the supreme court of the United States are to the same effect. I think, therefore, the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DIGGINS v. THORNTON. (No. 14,631.)

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—GROSS LACHES.

1. Where a summons is served nine years after the complaint is filed, the delay is grossly unreasonable, and, in the absence of a showing of the proper exercise of diligence, a motion to quash and dismiss the action should be granted.

2. Where, in such case, to defeat the motion an affidavit is offered, which shows that affiant made, at a time not mentioned, unsuccessful efforts to locate defendant, and about nine years after filing the complaint certain other efforts, which were successful, it will be assumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that both efforts were made at about the same time, and such affidavit will be held insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. SANDERSON, Judge.

Action by Thomas D. Thornton against A. C. Diggins. From an order refusing to quash a summons and dismiss an action for unreasonable delay in serving the summons, defendant appealed. Reversed.

J. K. Johnson, for appellant. J. M. Wood, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is taken from an order of the court refusing to quash a summons and dismiss an action by reason of unreasonable delay in the serving of defendant. The complaint had been filed some nine years when the summons was served. In the absence of a showing of the proper exercise of diligence in the service of the summons, the motion to quash and dismiss the action should have been granted, for the delay, of itself, was grossly unreasonable. To defeat the motion, respondent offered an affidavit of the clerk of his attorney, but we think it entirely insufficient to accomplish such result. While the affidavit sets out certain steps that he took in attempting to locate the residence of appellant, it entirely fails, and, it would seem, intentionally fails, to state at what time affiant was engaged in taking these steps. We are unable to say but that he was guilty of gross laches by not beginning his search for appellant sooner than he actually did. He does allege that early in December, 1890, in pursuance of his search for appellant, he examined the index to deeds in the recorder's office, and there his search came to a successful end. If his previous efforts in prosecuting the matter were carried on at about that date, (and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, we assume that to be the fact,) then respondent was guilty of such negligence as to entitle appellant to a dismissal of the action. Let the judgment be reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to quash the summons, and dismiss the action.

JACOBY et al. v. DELANO et al. (No. 10,712.)

(No. 14,697.)

Action on Promissory Notes—Parties—Power of Attorney—Power to Convey—Mortgage—Fraud — Rescission of Contract of Sale of Land.

1. Where, in an action on notes, by one of two payees, the verified complaint states that the other payee transferred all his title and interest in the notes to plaintiff for a valuable consideration, and plaintiff is now the holder and sole owner thereof, a general denial in the answer raises no issue as to plaintiff's title requiring proof to entitle him to recover.

2. An action may be maintained in the name of one of two payees of notes, since payment to either extinguishes the debt.

3. Where such action is consolidated with an action by defendants against both payees to cancel the notes on the ground of fraud and want of consideration, both payees are bound by the judgment therein.

4. A power of attorney, given by the owner of a half interest in certain land to the owner of the other half interest, provided that the attorney had "full power and authority to sell my interest when he sells his own" in the land described; "as full power and authority to sell said premises as I myself have; and do ratify and confirm all that he may lawfully do in the premises." The attorney lived in the state where the land was situate, while the grantor lived in another state. The attorney sold the lands, and executed a conveyance as such attorney in fact, and within a month visited the grantor of the power, reported the sale, and turned over the proceeds, which were accepted by such grantor, who brought this suit on the notes received in consideration of the conveyance. Held, in such action, that the attorney was authorized to execute the conveyance.

5. In such case the grantees in the deed cannot set up as a defense want of authority by the attorney to convey, even if the power is defective, since the vendors would be estopped from claiming such want of authority.

6. It is immaterial in such case that the certificate of acknowledgment to the power of attorney is defective.

7. A contention that a finding of fact is against the evidence will not be sustained where it cannot be done without discrediting a witness, since the credibility of witnesses is for the determination of the trial court.

8. In an action by a grantor against the grantees on notes and a mortgage executed by the latter in consideration of the conveyance of certain land, it appeared that defendants went into possession immediately after the purchase, surveyed and divided it into lots and blocks, laid out streets, recorded maps, and sold lots in accordance therewith. Nearly a year afterwards they paid several thousand dollars on the mortgage, and more than a year afterwards asked for an extension of three months' time on the balance, and no action was brought until four months after such request. Two months thereafter defendants served plaintiff with notice of rescission on account of the fraudulent representations of the grantors, and their failure to perform certain acts which were required to be done before the partial payment and request for time were made by defendants. Held, that defendants had recognized the validity of the notes and mortgage, and waived the right to rescind.

9. In such action it appeared that the grantors agreed to release from the mortgage any particular lots sold by defendants on payment to the former of a specified proportion of the consideration received therefor. Plaintiff was not tendered any sum on account of the sale of such lots. Held, that defendants were not entitled to rescind the contract on account of a failure to release such lots, especially as it appeared that the other grantor, acting for himself, and as the agent of plaintiff, released them.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Actions by C. Delano against Jacoby and others to foreclose a mortgage, and by Jacoby and others against C. Delano and C. J. Culver to cancel the notes and mortgage in suit on the ground of fraud and want of consideration. From a judgment in favor of Delano and Culver, Jacoby and others appeal. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendricks and Henry Bleecker, for appellants. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, Victor Montgomery, and F. W. Sanborn, for respondents.

Paterson, J. On September 12, 1887, Culver, claiming to act under a power of attorney from Delano, sold and conveyed a tract of land owned by himself and Delano to Jacoby et al. By the terms of the agreement the purchasers were to pay off a prior mortgage of $5,000, and the sum of $13,000, $6,000 of which was paid in cash. Of the remaining $7,000, $3,500 was to be paid in one year, and the remainder in two years, with interest at 10 per cent. Two notes were given by the purchasers for $3,500 each, one payable in one year and the other in two years, and payment thereof was secured by a mortgage on the lands sold. The case No. 10,111 is an action for the recovery of the amount due on these two notes, and to foreclose the mortgage given as security for the payment thereof. The answer in that case consists—First. Of a general denial. Second. Allegations that Delano and Culver never had title to the lands, or any portion of the same; and as soon as they discovered this fact, and before the commencement of this action, they rescinded the contract, and offered to restore to the plaintiff and Culver everything of value they had received under the contract. Third. That the defendants were induced to enter into the agreement by false and fraudulent representations, (which are specifically set forth,) and that within a reasonable time after they discovered the facts the defendants rescinded the contract, and offered to restore to plaintiff and Culver everything of value they had received under the contract. Fourth. That the defendants were induced to enter into the agreement by reason of the promise of plaintiff and Culver that said Culver would immediately "commence to erect five cottages on the tract of land known as the 'Culver Hotel Tract,' being lands adjoining the lands above mentioned," water and light the streets, and keep them watered and lighted, open and maintain an hotel on said hotel tract, etc.; that they have kept and performed all the conditions on their part, but none of the promises made by plaintiff and Culver has been fulfilled, and by reason thereof the consideration for the note has wholly failed; that within a reasonable time after the nonfulfillment of the conditions of the contract they demanded the return of the notes, and offered to return to plaintiff and Culver everything of value they had received from them under the contract. Case No. 10,712 is an action brought by Jacoby et al., the purchasers referred to, for an accounting of all moneys paid by the plaintiffs on account of the purchase money of the lands, and for the delivery and cancellation of the notes and mortgages. The complaint consists of allegations essentially the same as those made in the answer above referred to. The court, in its findings, negatived all of the allegations made by Jacoby et al., and judgment in each case was rendered in favor of Delano in accordance with his prayer.

It is claimed by appellants that there is no evidence to support the finding of the court that Delano is the owner and holder of the notes and mortgage. But the complaint alleged that "on or about the 24th day of September, 1887, the said C. Z. Culver transferred and assigned for a valuable consideration all his right, title, and interest in said two promissory notes to plaintiff, and plaintiff is now the holder and sole owner thereof;" and there is no denial of this allegation in the answer. There is, it is true, a general denial, but as the complaint was verified, the general denial raised no issue. Furthermore, plaintiff and Culver are named in the notes as payees. Payment to either, therefore, with or without suit, will extinguish the debt. Section 1475, Civil Code; Lyman v. Gedney, 114 Ill. 388, 29 N. E. Rep. 282; Henry v. Mt. Pleasant, 70 Mo. 500. Culver was made a party defendant in the second action, and will be bound by the judgment.

Appellants contend that the power of attorney from Delano to Culver was wholly insufficient to authorize the latter to execute a deed. It reads as follows: "I do hereby appoint C. J. Culver my agent and attorney in fact, with full power and authority to sell my interest when he sells his own in that lot or parcel of land situate in the county of Los Angeles. [Here follows particular description of the property to be sold.] I hereby give my said agent and attorney as full power and authority to sell said premises as I myself have; and do ratify and confirm all that he may lawfully do in the premises. Given under my hand and seal this 23d day of July, 1887. [Seal.] C. DELANO." Following the signature is a certificate of acknowledgment in these words: "State of Ohio, Knox county—ss.: Personally appeared before me C. Delano, and acknowledged signing and sealing of this power of attorney to be his voluntary act and deed. Given under my hand and official seal this 23d day of July, A. D. 1887. [Seal.] JOHN S. BRADDOCK, Notary Public." This power of attorney was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, August 2, 1887. It is said that, as the acknowledgment was insufficient to prove the power of attorney, or entitle it to record, it was not constructive notice to anybody. We do not understand the intended force of this suggestion. If the power of attorney was otherwise valid, it was good as between the parties to the transaction, whether recorded or not.

There is an apparent conflict of authority on the question as to what is necessary in a power of attorney for the sale of land to authorize the attorney to execute and deliver a deed to the purchaser. Each case must be decided upon its own peculiar circumstances. McNiel v. Shirley, 33 Cal. 206; Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 220; Hemstreet v. Burdick, 90 Ill. 444. As between the parties to the transaction, it is proper to consider their situation at the time of the execution of the letter, and their intention is to be gathered from the words of the instrument, and all the circumstances under which it was written and acted upon. "The vendor may be unwilling to deal with a particular proposed purchaser on any terms. He may consider him pecuniarily unable to comply with the contract, even if the title prove satisfactory; and he may decline to bind himself to convey to such a purchaser at the end of the time necessary to examine the title, because he might thereby in the mean time lose an opportunity to sell to some other person, who might desire to purchase, and in whose good faith and ability to pay he reposed entire confidence." Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 245. So the general rule is that a mere authority "to sell," in the absence of any other words or circumstances qualifying the language, would not confer upon the agent the power to determine these matters for his principal. There are some exceptions to the rule. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 360, and cases there cited. In this case, Delano and Culver were joint owners of the property. Culver lived in this state, Delano in Ohio; and the latter had the utmost confidence in the former. The language of the letter is emphatic, and carries with it the conviction that Delano intended that Culver should do something more than merely find a purchaser for him. Culver was intending to sell and convey his interest in the land, and Delano evidently intended at the same time to dispose of and convey his own interest through Culver. Within a month after the sale Culver visited Delano at Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, and there made a report of their joint transactions in land in California, including the transaction under consideration. Delano does not appear to have been at all surprised to find that Culver had taken the notes and mortgage, and must have known from this fact that he had given a deed to the purchasers. It is contended by the appellants that Delano denied that he had given Culver authority to act for him, but an examination of his testimony reveals the fact that he repudiated merely the right to Culver to make any representations as to what would be done in or about the premises. He never repudiated his right to sell, nor has he ever expressed any dissatisfaction with the terms of the sale, or the execution and delivery of the deed. His denial of the right of Culver to make the representations alleged becomes immaterial in view of the finding of the court that the representations made by Culver were neither fraudulent nor false. We find nothing in the authorities upon which appellants rely that is opposed to the views we have expressed.

But, if it be conceded that the power of attorney was defective or insufficient to authorize a conveyance, the vendors, under the facts shown, would be estopped from claiming that Culver's acts were without authority. The latter claimed the right to convey, and acted upon such claim. Delano ratified his acts by approving the report which he made, by accepting the notes and mortgage, and by insisting upon payment of the balance of the purchase price. 2 Herm. Estop. §§ 792, 793; Simson v. Eckstein, 22 Cal. 595; Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 413. Equitable estoppels must be mutual, and, if the vendor cannot refuse to convey after receiving and accepting the benefit of the act done by the agent, it would be inequitable to permit the vendee, after taking and holding possession for several years, making payments, and otherwise treating the contract as valid, to take advantage of the defect in the agent's original grant of authority. If the vendor cannot repudiate the ratified act of his agent after the property has increased in value, the vendee should not be permitted to escape from the effect of the act so ratified after the property has decreased in value. A similar question was passed upon in a recent and well-considered case, where Mr. Justice McFarland, expressing the views of the court, said: "The court does not find whether or not Meux signed the contract, or was a party to it; but the evidence clearly shows that he ratified it as soon as his covendor informed him of it, and soon afterwards, when he came to Fresno, 'again ratified the sale between the parties, and talked with the purchasers about it.' Again, when the deferred payments became due, he asked the vendees for the money, and they, making no objection of any kind, simply asked for some delay until they could make arrangements to pay. They proposed at one time to give a mortgage, and then concluded not to do so; and finally Meux united with Glenn in executing and tendering a deed. This was a complete ratification, and he would have been estopped from making a defense for himself which plaintiff seeks to suggest for him." 23 Pac. Rep. 406. There is no conflict between the decision in the case just referred to and the one rendered in Salfield v. Reclamation Co., (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 1105, and the facts in the latter case were entirely different from those shown by the record herein.

The contention that the court's finding that Culver made no false or fraudulent representations is against the evidence cannot be sustained unless we discredit and discard the testimony of Culver, and this we have no right to do. The credibility of the witness is always a matter for determination in the court below. It is not clear that the alleged representations, if proved, would constitute a defense to the action, (Kerr, Fraud & M. p. 89; Jefferson v. Hewitt, [Cal.] 30 Pac. Rep. 772;) but, if conceded to be true, and sufficient to avoid the sale, appellants are not entitled to a rescission. The representations alleged were made in July, 1887. The deed was executed and delivered in September of the same year. Immediately thereafter the purchasers went into possession of the land, surveyed and divided it into lots and blocks, laid out streets and alleys. Maps thereof were recorded in the office of the county recorder, and several lots were sold in accordance therewith. Within two weeks after the transaction was closed, Culver ceased sprinkling the streets, and within two months thereafter ceased lighting the streets. He made no attempt to proceed with the improvements he said he would make, and in May, 1888, he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, thus acknowledging his inability to carry out his promises. In March, 1888, the purchasers paid $3,000 on the $5,000 mortgage, and in September, 1888, they asked for an extension of three months' additional time in which to pay the $3,500 notes. Whether this request was granted does not appear in the testimony, but we think the court was justified in finding it was, because it does appear that no action was brought to enforce payment of the same until March 27, 1889. No complaint whatever was made by the purchasers until January 22, 1889, when Mr. Thorne, manager for the syndicate purchasers, wrote to Mr. Delano, inquiring whether the promises made by Culver were to be fulfilled. The notice of rescission was not served upon Delano until March 26, 1889. By these acts and omissions the purchasers recognized the validity of the notes and mortgages in suit, (Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55,) and waive their right of rescission of the contract, (section 1691, Civil Code; Marston v. Simpson, 54 Cal. 189; Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. Rep. 868; Schiffer v. Dietz, 83 N. Y. 300.)

The failure of Delano to execute a release of the mortgage, so far as it affected the lots sold, did not warrant a rescission of the contract. By the terms of the mortgage the vendors were to "release any particular lot or lots of such subdivision from the lien of this mortgage upon payment to them of such amount for each and every lot so to be released, as is expressed by the quotient, taken in dollars, obtained by dividing the entire sum due upon said promissory notes at the date of executing such release by the entire number of lots into which said mortgaged premises shall have been so subdivided according to said map or plat so filed." Delano was not told into how many lots the tract had been divided, nor was any offer made to pay him at any place or time any sum of money whatever. The number of lots into which the tract was to be divided was a matter entirely within the discretion of the purchasers, and it is their duty to tender the amount due on account of the release requested. Furthermore, it appears in the record that the bank release the lots from the lien of the mortgage, and that Culver, acting for himself, and as agent for Delano, did the same thing. The judgments and the orders are affirmed.

CLARKE et al. v. AUSTIN et al. (No. 14,891.)

CONTRIBUTION — PAYMENT OF JUDGMENT BY ONE OF SEVERAL DEFENDANTS—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Code Civil Proc. § 709, provides that where one of several persons liable on a judgment pays more than his proportion he may compel contribution from the others, and shall be entitled to the benefit of the judgment to enforce contribution if within 10 days after his payment he file with the clerk notice of his payment and claim to contribution, and that on filing such notice the clerk must make an entry thereof in the margin of the docket. Held, that the notice is required to be filed with the clerk merely to enable him to make the entry on the docket, and notice to the other defendant of a motion for execution on the judgment to enforce contribution, though necessary, need not be served within 10 days.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by A. M. Clarke and W. H. McKenzie against Paul P. Austin and another to foreclose a mortgage. After judgment one of the defendants, E. K. Clarke, filed the statutory notice for contribution, and prayed that execution issue on the judgment in his favor and against his codefendant. From an order denying the motion, E. K. Clarke appealed. Reversed.

Craig & Meredith, for appellants. Richards & Welch, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage. The defendants, Austin, E. K. Clarke, and Bruce Cavitt were jointly liable to the plaintiffs for the mortgage debt, but, as between each other, Austin was bound to pay only one half, Clarke one third, and Cavitt one sixth. Before judgment Clarke paid his portion, one third of the debt, viz., $4,065; and a decree of foreclosure passed for the unpaid portion of the debt, ordering a sale of the mortgaged premises, and that a joint judgment be docketed against Austin, Clarke, and Cavitt, for any deficiency of proceeds of sale to pay the debt. The sheriff sold the mortgaged property, and returned a deficiency of $7,913, for which a judgment was docketed as per order of the court. It appears that on May 12, 1891, Clarke paid $4,025.60 of this judgment in addition to his payment of one third of the whole debt before judgment, and also that full satisfaction of the judgment was entered on the same day; but it does not appear when or by whom the balance of the judgment was paid. Clarke claimed the benefit of the judgment to enforce contribution or repayment from Austin to him of the full sum, $4,025.60, paid by him on the judgment, under section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and within 10 days after his payment of this sum filed with the clerk of the court in which the judgment was docketed the following notice:

"Notice of payment. To A. C. Williams, Esqr., county clerk of Fresno county: You will please take notice that the defendant E. K. Clarke did on this 12th day of May, 1891, pay to the plaintiffs four thousand and twenty-five dollars and sixty cents, and that said payment was more than the due proportion of the judgment herein which said defendant Clarke ought to pay in the whole of said sum so paid, to wit, $4,025.60, and that he claims that he has the right to contribution and repayment from the defendant Paul P. Austin, and that he is entitled to the benefit of the said judgment against said Austin in said sum of four thousand and twenty-five dollars and sixty cents. You are requested to enter this claim upon the judgment docket. CRAIG & MEREDITH, Attorneys for Defendant E. K. Clarke."

Thereupon the clerk made the following entry in the margin of docket of the judgment: "The defendant E. K. Clarke has filed with me notice of his claim to repayment from defendant Paul P. Austin of four thousand and twenty-five dollars and sixty cents, being more than his due proportion, and he claims the benefit of the judgment herein against said Austin. Attest: A. C. WILLIAMS, Clerk. By L. R. WILLIAMS, Deputy. May 12, 1891."

Neither this entry nor the notice filed with the clerk was served on Austin or Cavitt. On June 6, 1891, Clarke served by mail on Austin the following notice and affidavit: (Title of court and cause.) "Notice of motion. You will please take notice that on Wednesday, the 24th day of June, 1891, at the hour of ten o'clock A. M., in the court room of department two of said court, in the county courthouse of said county, the defendant E. K. Clarke will move the court to order execution to issue herein in favor of defendant Clarke and against the defendant Austin, on the ground that the defendant Clarke has paid more than his due proportion of the judgment herein. Said motion will be made upon the affidavit of defendant Clarke, a copy of which is herewith served, and upon the papers and pleadings on file and the entries in the record of this cause. CRAIG & MEREDITH, Attorneys for Defendant Clarke." (Title of court and cause.) "Affidavit of defendant Clarke. E. K. Clarke, being sworn says, that he is one of the defendants in the above-entitled cause; that the consideration upon which the defendants Austin, Cavitt, and the affiant became liable to pay the note and mortgage mentioned in the judgment herein was as follows: The defendant Griffith did on or about the 1st day of September, 1889, sell and convey to the three last-named defendants the land described in said judgment in the following proportion: One half thereof to the defendant Austin, one third to this affiant, and one sixth to the defendant Cavitt. And the said three defendants furnished and agreed with each other to furnish the consideration moving to the said Griffith in the same proportion. A portion of said consideration was the assuming by said grantees of the mortgage described in said judgment; that the residue of said consideration was the assignment to said

Griffith of an interest in a certain patent right to manufacture ice machines; that said patent right was owned by said three defendants in said proportion; that afterwards, on or about the 1st day of December, 1889, this affiant paid to the said plaintiff the sum of $4,065, and said sum was one third of the amount then due on said note and mortgage; that afterwards, on the 12th day of May, 1891, this affiant also paid to the plaintiff on account of the judgment herein the sum of $4,025.60; that neither Austin nor Cavitt has paid to this affiant any part of said last-named sum; that the defendant Austin has not, nor has the defendant Cavitt, paid the plaintiff any part of said note or mortgage; that the defendant Griffith did on the 12th day of May, 1891, procure and cause to be entered a satisfaction in full from the plaintiff McKenzie of said judgment."

It appears that the motion was heard on the foregoing papers and the judgment roll and docket entries in the foreclosure action, and that the motion was denied. But the record does not show whether or not Austin appeared at the hearing, though it is asserted by counsel for appellant and not denied that he did. Clarke brings this appeal from the order denying his motion.

It is true that the right of Clarke to enforce contribution by proceedings under section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure[1] is made to depend upon the condition that he must have filed with the clerk, within 10 days after his payment of more than his proportion of the judgment, "notice of his payment and claim to contribution or repayment." It is also true that Austin was entitled to notice of Clarke's motion for execution upon the judgment. But it was not necessary, as contended by respondent, that the notice filed with the clerk should have been served on Austin within 10 days after Clarke's payment of more than his proportion of the judgment, as this is neither expressly nor impliedly required by the section of the Code authorizing the proceeding. The only purposes of filing the notice with the clerk are to authorize and to enable him to make the proper entry in the margin of the docket. Without such notice the clerk would have neither the authority nor the ability to make the proper docket entry. Some dicta apparently inconsistent with this view are to be found in Davis v. Heimbach, 75 Cal. 262, 17 Pac. Rep. 199. In that case, however, execution was ordered and issued without notice to the parties against whom it was issued. The lower court quashed the execution, and this court affirmed the order, saying: "The order directing the execution having been without notice, the proceedings were properly vacated." This is all that was decided in Davis v. Heimbach. It is contended by respondent that upon the showing made at the hearing Austin was not bound to contribute to Clarke the sum claimed, $4,025.60; but I think this is a mistake. From the data furnished, I cannot figure Austin's liability to Clarke to be less than the sum demanded. But, however this may be, the whole matter may be properly estimated and adjusted upon a rehearing of the motion. I think the order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: Temple, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

IRELAN v. COLGAN, Comptroller. (No. 14,811.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1892.)

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE — APPROPRIATION FOR SALARY OF STATE OFFICER.

The legislature created an office to remain in existence two years only from the 18th of May, 1889, and provided therefor a salary of $3,000 a year. The act in which the appropriation of $6,000 for the salary for the two years was made stated that the sums appropriated were for the objects thereinafter expressed, and for the support of the government of the state for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years. The forty-first fiscal year began July 1, 1889, a month and a half after the creation of the office. Held, that it was the intention of the legislature to provide in its appropriation for the payment of that part of the salary which became due before the beginning of the forty-first fiscal year.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Petition by Irelan for a writ of mandate to compel Colgan, state comptroller, to pay money to petitioner, claimed by him to be due on his salary as state engineer. From an order sustaining a demurrer to his petition, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Matt Clarken and Mr. De Alexander, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

Paterson, J. In 1889 an act was passed and approved which created the office of state engineer, "to remain in existence for a period of two years only," and provided that the state mineralogist should be ex officio state engineer, at a salary of $3,000 per year. St. 1889, p. 328. The act took effect on May 18, 1889,—60 days after its passage; and from that time until May 19, 1891, when the office ceased to exist, the petitioner—who was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting state mineralogist—performed the duties of the office created by the act. He received his salary as engineer from July 1, 1889, to May 19, 1891, which period constituted the forty-first fiscal year, and a portion of the forty-second. The respondent refused to draw a warrant in favor of petitioner for salary ($350) due the latter as engineer from May 19, 1889, to July 1, 1889, claiming that no appropriation had been made to pay any portion of the salary for the fortieth fiscal year. Thereupon the petitioner applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate, a demurrer to his petition was filed, the court below sustained the comptroller in his contention, the prayer of the petitioner was denied, and from the judgment the latter has appealed to this court.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 709, provides that where one of several persons liable on a judgment pays more than his proportion he may compel contribution from the others, and that in such case he is entitled to the benefit of the judgment to enforce contribution or repayment "if within 10 days after his payment he file with the clerk of the court where the judgment was rendered notice of his payment and claim to contribution. Upon the filing of such notice the clerk must make an entry thereof in the margin of the docket."

The attorney general, on behalf of the respondent, contends that the item, "For the salary of the state engineer, state mineralogist ex officio, six thousand dollars," in the general appropriation act of March 21, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 438,) was an appropriation for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years only, and that no part of it can be used in payment of salary earned in the fortieth fiscal year. The argument is based upon the provisions of section 1 of the act, which reads as follows: "Section 1. The following sums of money are hereby appropriated out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, and for the support of the government of the state of California for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years." It is said that, as the fiscal year commences on July 1st, this provision of the general appropriation act expressly limits the use of the moneys therein appropriated to the support of the government from July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1891. The fallacy of the contention rests in the assumption that the intention of the legislature must be gathered from the provisions of the appropriation act alone, and in the failure to consider other statutes which bear upon the question. The appropriations made are not only for the "support of the government * * * for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years;" they were made also for the objects thereinafter expressed, one of which objects was the payment of $6,000 to the state engineer, whose term of office had been expressly limited to two years, and his salary fixed at $3,000 per year. In determining whether an appropriation has been made for the payment of a particular claim, we do not look merely at the form of words used. The intention of the legislature is to be ascertained from the language of the act, and the provisions of other statutes relating to the same subject, and the nature of the claim for which the appropriation is made. If it clearly appears from these things that the legislature intended to pay a certain amount at a certain time, or in installments at certain times, and has designated the fund from which the money is to be paid, the appropriation is complete, and payment will be enforced by mandate, regardless of form in the wording of the appropriation act. Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. Rep. 111.

Looking at the various provisions of the law bearing upon the question under consideration, the intention of the legislature to appropriate enough to pay the state engineer $250 per month from the time the act took effect until the office ceased to exist is clearly shown. The life of the office was fixed at two years. The salary of the officer was fixed at $3,000 per year. The legislature knew that under section 1029, Pol. Code, "unless otherwise provided by law, the salaries of officers must be paid out of the general fund in the state treasury, monthly on the last day of each month;" that is to say, it was known that, unless the bill creating the office and providing for the payment of the salary thereof, provided otherwise, the officer would be entitled to receive at the end of each month and every month of his term of office one twelfth of his annual salary. To meet the demands which would thus be made upon the treasury every month of the two-years term fixed in the act of March 19th, the item of $6,000 was inserted in the general appropriation act. If the legislature did not intend to provide for the payment of the engineer's salary for the period of one month and twelve days prior to the commencement of the forty-first fiscal year, why did it include the amount necessary therefor ($350) in the appropriation? The legislature knew, of course, that the amount of the engineer's salary for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years would be only $5,650, and that at the end of that period the office would cease to exist. What disposition was to be made of the balance of the $6,000 appropriated "for the salary of the state engineer, state mineralogist ex officio?" It is entirely clear to us that the amount was set aside to pay the engineer's salary for the full period named in the act creating the office, and to avoid the necessity of any further appropriation for that purpose. It was unnecessary for the legislature to add to this item of appropriation the date of payment of the first installment. The appropriation, being one for payment of the salary of an officer of the state, whose term and whose office began and expired together, (section 1029, Pol. Code,) fixed the times of payments as conclusively as if such times and installments had been expressly stated in connection with the item of appropriation. It is alleged in the petition, and must be taken as true, "that there is an unexhausted specific appropriation provided by law in the state treasury of said state, and not otherwise appropriated, to meet and pay the said $350." The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and permit the respondent to answer.

HUBBACK v. ROSS et al. (No. 13,148.)

DELIVERY OF DEED—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

Defendant executed a deed, naming plaintiff as grantee, and delivered it to M. There was no evidence to show for what purpose such deed was executed, nor was there any agreement between plaintiff and defendant in regard thereto. Held, that a delivery of the deed to plaintiff by M. could only constitute either an absolute sale of the land to plaintiff, or a mortgage of it by defendant to plaintiff, for some liability of her own to plaintiff, and that M. was not acting within the apparent scope of his authority when he delivered the deed to secure plaintiff for advances made to himself.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action to have a deed declared a mortgage, by Hubback against Ann S. Ross and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb and Hepburn Wilkins, for appellant. Wm. Barber, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint in this action alleges, among other matters, that in the year 1885 the plaintiff had business correspondents in Liverpool, and that one Makin requested him to procure from said correspondents an advance of money to him, Makin, upon the security and in anticipation of the sale of a quantity of wheat which said Makin had shipped to Liverpool, and that he agreed to secure the plaintiff against any loss by reason of the transaction; that thereupon the plaintiff drew in his own name certain bills of exchange upon said correspondents, amounting to about £31,000, payable to said Makin, and which were thereafter accepted and paid by the drawees. The complaint further alleges that at the time of drawing said bills of exchange he demanded of Makin security therefor, and thereupon the defendant Ann S. Ross, by request of said Makin, made and executed an instrument in writing, in form a deed of conveyance of certain described real property, and gave the same to Makin, with direction to deliver it to plaintiff, which was done by him on or about April 1, 1885. The complaint then proceeds to aver that said conveyance was executed and delivered to plaintiff as a mortgage to secure the repayment to him by said Makin "of any moneys which plaintiff might be required to pay to his said correspondents and agents in case the proceeds of sale of said wheat should be insufficient to repay them the amount of said drafts so accepted and paid by them." It is further alleged that plaintiff was compelled to pay on account of said bills of exchange the sum of $10,733, and this action is brought to have the said deed declared a mortgage, and that the land therein described be sold, and the proceeds of the sale applied to the payment of the said sum of $10,733, costs, etc. The defendants, in their answer, deny that the deed was executed to plaintiff for the purposes alleged in the complaint, and in this connection allege "that, prior to the month of April, 1885, the said R. G. Makin had contracted a debt to the firm of Makin & Bancroft, of Liverpool, in England, and that at the request of the said R. G. Makin, the defendant Ann S. Ross executed the said deed to the said plaintiff for the purpose of enabling him, by means thereof, to raise money to discharge the said indebtedness of the said R. G. Makin to the said firm of Makin & Bancroft." The defendants also filed a cross complaint, in which they allege that "the said plaintiff received the said deed from said Makin with full notice of the purpose for which it was to be used, namely, to raise money to enable said Makin to pay the aforesaid claim secured by said mortgage, (a mortgage alleged to have been executed by defendant Ann S. Ross to secure the claim of Makin & Bancroft against R. C. Makin and defendant Ross,) and promised and agreed with said defendant Ann S. Ross to use it for that purpose, and no other;" and that the defendant failed to raise any money to pay said claim, "and redelivered the said deed to the said Makin, who retained possession thereof until his death." At the close of the testimony offered by plaintiff, the defendants moved to dismiss the action, which motion was granted, and a judgment of dismissal entered. The plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff was a witness in his own behalf, and testified that Makin delivered to him the conveyance referred to in the complaint. He was then asked what Makin gave him the deed for, and whether he accepted it as an absolute conveyance; and, if he did not, to state the purpose for which he received it; and at a later stage of the trial the plaintiff offered to prove what was said by Makin at the time he delivered it. The defendants objected to the questions and offer, and their objections were sustained by the court. It is apparent, and, indeed, it is conceded by respondents, that plaintiff sought by this offered evidence to show by the declarations of Makin, made at the time, that he delivered the conveyance in behalf of defendant Ross for the purposes and upon the agreement alleged in the complaint; in other words, the plaintiff sought to show that it was agreed between himself and Makin that the deed was to be delivered to secure the plaintiff against any loss which he might sustain on account of the bills of exchange he had drawn in favor of Makin. The rulings of the court in excluding this evidence present the questions which are necessary to be noticed in this opinion. There was no evidence given or offered to show that Makin had any actual authority from defendant Ross to deliver the deed to defendant for the purposes alleged in the complaint, and the pleadings upon the part of defendants do not admit that he had any such authority. These pleadings only contain the admission that Makin was authorized to deliver the deed as a mortgage to raise money to pay a certain named indebtedness, the amount of which is not specified, but which was shown by the evidence to be about $2,000. It needs no argument to show that a power to deliver the deed for such a purpose was not an actual authority to Makin to enter into any such transaction in behalf of his principal, the defendant Ross, as that which is alleged in the complaint. We do not understand that this position is seriously controverted by plaintiff, but it is claimed by him that Makin was clothed with an apparent authority to deliver the deed as a mortgage to secure the plaintiff for the advances made to Makin. There can be no doubt that if Makin did have conferred upon him such ostensible authority, then the court erred in not permitting the plaintiff to show that such authority was in fact exercised by him. While it is true that the authority of a person to act as agent for another in a particular matter cannot be proven by the declarations of the one assuming to act as such agent, yet, when it is once shown that a person has been given an actual or ostensible authority to act for another in a particular matter, any declarations made by such agent at the time of the transaction of the business intrusted or apparently intrusted to him, and relating to such business, is admissible as a part of the res gestæ. 2 Whart. Ev. §§ 1170, 1173; 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 113; Moore v. Bettis, 11 Humph. 67; Robinson v. Walton, 58 Mo. 380. This being so, the real question to be decided here is whether it was shown that defendant Ross did confer upon Makin the apparent authority to act for her, and deliver to plaintiff the deed referred to for the purpose of securing plaintiff against loss by reason of the bills of exchange which he drew in favor of Makin, the plaintiff knowing at the time that such bills were to be used by Makin in his own business. The defendant Ross never personally made any agreement with the plaintiff for a sale of the land described in the deed, or any personal agreement with him for the delivery of the deed for any purpose; and it is contended that when, under such circumstances, she intrusted to Makin the deed signed by herself, and in which the plaintiff was named as grantee, she conferred upon such agent an ostensible authority to agree upon the terms and conditions upon which it should be delivered, and that she is bound by the agreement under which the deed was in fact delivered by Makin, as plaintiff was without actual knowledge that such agent was making a fraudulent use of the deed. But it seems clear to us that, upon the facts stated, Makin was not clothed with any ostensible authority to deliver the deed as a security for a personal loan or advance made to himself, and, as plaintiff knew that this was the purpose for which the deed was given to him, he accepted the same at his own peril, and defendant Ross is not bound by such act of Makin, without proof that she actually authorized him to deliver the deed as security for the debt of such agent. This conclusion rests upon these two propositions, either one of which is a complete answer to the contention of plaintiff that defendant Ross is bound by the agreement under which it is claimed that Makin delivered the deed: First. The apparent authority of Makin to act for defendant Ross, arising from his possession of the deed, did not extend further than to empower him to make a sale of the land to plaintiff; to agree upon the price and other terms of the contract of sale; and thereupon to deliver the deed as an absolute conveyance. Second. But if it should be conceded that, by intrusting such deed to Makin, the defendant Ross gave him, as such agent, an apparent authority to deliver the same to plaintiff as a mortgage, still such apparent authority in Makin was limited by one of the fundamental principles of the law of agency to the right to deliver it only as a security for some obligation of his principal. In intrusting the deed in question to Makin the defendant Ross did not clothe him with any apparent authority to deliver it except for her benefit, and the plaintiff was not justified as a matter of ordinary prudence in presuming that Makin might use the instrument for his own benefit and purpose. In the case of Nippel v. Hammond, 4 Colo. 211, the agent was authorized by a written power of attorney "in the name, place, and stead" of the principal "to sell and convey the premises by warranty deed or deed of trust, or by deed of mortgage, as he might deem advisable." The agent executed a trust deed of the premises,—mentioned in the power of attorney,—but for the purpose of securing his own individual note. There was nothing in the power which, by express terms, limited the right of the agent to execute conveyances only for the benefit of the principal, but the court held that such was the only authority conferred, saying: "A general power to incumber real estate, without declaring for whose benefit it may be incurred, will not warrant the attorney in incumbering it for the benefit of himself or any other person. It hence results that the deed of trust was ineffectual to convey Arnold Hofstadt's interest in the premises described therein." This principle is also illustrated in Trust Co. v. Abbott, 44 N. J. Law, 257. That was an action upon a promissory note, signed with the defendant's name by Jesse R. Abbott, who acted under the following power of attorney: "Sir: This is to certify that J. R. Abbott * * * is this day appointed with power of attorney, and authorized by me to sign my name to any paper or papers, notes, etc. T. ABBOTT." It was shown that the note in suit was executed by the agent for his own personal benefit, and it was held that, as its execution was outside of the principal's business, it was unauthorized, and that the plaintiff could not recover without showing that it took the note before maturity for value, and without notice. It follows from these views that, as Makin was not acting within the scope of his apparent authority in delivering the deed for the purposes alleged in the complaint, the court did not err in refusing to admit in evidence his declarations, or in excluding evidence of the agreement which he assumed to make with plaintiff at that time. Judgment and order affirmed.

BAKER v. BAKER et al. (No. 14,286.)

EXPRESS TRUST — DECLARATION IN WRITING — ESTOPPEL — ACTION TO SET ASIDE PARTITION — EVIDENCE.

1. Under Civil Code, § 852, subd. 1, providing that no trust in relation to real property is valid unless created and declared "by a written instrument subscribed by the trustee," such a trust is sufficiently declared by a deposition of the trustee, made in an action wherein the question of the creation of such trust was involved, and by which it appears that he so held the property in question.

2. Where a mother conveys real estate to her son, in trust, the rents and profits thereof to be used for her support, and on her death the estate to be equally divided among her heirs, and the son and other heirs voluntarily partition the same among themselves, before the mother's death, such son or his wife should not afterwards be allowed to complain of such partition on the ground that it was made in violation of the trust.

3. In an action by the son's wife to set aside one of the partition deeds, on the ground that she did not join therein, there is no prejudicial error in refusing to allow her to introduce the judgment roll of an action by the mother against the son, his wife, and the other heirs, to set aside the partition and enforce the trust, and wherein it was decided that the property was not held in trust, but that defendants therein, as against the mother, were the owners of the parts partitioned to them.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced in the superior court of Humboldt county on the 15th day of March, 1889, and it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff is, and at all times mentioned therein was, the wife of Erastus J. Baker; that on the 22d day of January, 1879, she and her husband were the owners in fee and possessed of a certain described tract of land situate in Humboldt county, and containing 20 acres, more or less, and that on the day named her husband filed and caused to be recorded a declaration of homestead on the said land, in which all the facts necessary for the selection of a homestead were fully and truly set out; that the homestead was never abandoned, and thereafter, on the 29th day of September, 1886, the husband executed to the defendants a deed of the said land, in which she refused to join; that under the said deed the defendants entered into possession of the land, and have ever since claimed, and now claim, the sole and entire ownership thereof, to the exclusion of and in hostility to the plaintiff; that such claim of ownership and possession is a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and prevents her from having the full enjoyment of her homestead rights. Wherefore, she prays that the deed to defendants may be declared null and void, and that she be restored to the possession of the land. The defendants answered, denying all the averments of the complaint, and by way of cross complaint set up facts showing that the land in controversy, with other land, was held by their grantor in trust for them and others, and that the deed complained of was made and delivered in execution of that trust. The plaintiff answered to the cross complaint, denying most of its averments, and alleging that the affirmative defense set up therein is barred by the statute of limitations, and also by a former judgment rendered in an action, in which Elvira B. Wolverton was plaintiff, and Erastus J. Baker and others were defendants. The court below found the facts and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and from that judgment and an order denying her motion for a new trial the plaintiff appeals. After an elaborate discussion of the matters involved in the case, the learned counsel for appellant says in his brief: "This appeal turns entirely upon two questions: (1) Are the findings relating to the alleged trust supported by the evidence? (2) Did the court err in the introduction and rejection of evidence to sustain or refute the said trust?" The material and admitted facts of the case are as follows: In 1878, Elvira B. Baker was the owner of 80 acres of land in Humboldt county, of which the land in controversy was a part. She was a widow, 73 years of age, and had four children, Erastus J. Baker, Andrew T. Baker, Alonzo T. Baker, and Mary A. Church. On the 3d day of December, 1878, she, by a bargain and sale deed, expressing a consideration of $10, conveyed to her son Erastus all of her said land, and on the 30th day of the same month, for the expressed consideration of $1, she executed to him a second deed of the land. In the first deed there were some errors in the description of the property, and the second deed was made to correct those errors. At the time of the execution of these deeds, Erastus had a wife and three children, and was residing on the land conveyed to him, near the house of his mother, and was the only one of the three brothers who lived in the county. On the 22d day of January, 1879, Erastus filed and had recorded a declaration of homestead upon the said 80 acres, in which he stated that he was the head of a family, and was actually residing with his family upon the land described, and that he intended to claim and use the same as a homestead, and estimated its value to be $4,500.

On the 1st day of January, 1879, the mother, Elvira, married one B. F. Wolverton, and on the 12th of July of that year Erastus executed to her and her husband a written lease of about five acres of the land for the term of the natural life of the lessees, and at an annual rent of one cent. In June, 1885, Alonzo and his then wife, the defendant Mary, executed to Erastus a deed conveying to him all their right, title, and interest in and to the said 80 acres, and for this conveyance Erastus paid Alonzo $1,000 in cash. Alonzo afterwards died during that year, and his widow subsequently married the defendant Andrew. In September, 1886, the two surviving brothers and sister partitioned the said 80 acres among themselves, as follows: The defendants and Mrs. Church conveyed all their right, title, and interest in and to 40 acres thereof to Erastus; Erastus and the defendants conveyed all their right, title, and interest in and to 20 acres thereof to Mrs. Church; and Erastus and Mrs. Church conveyed all their right, title, and interest in and to the 20 acres thereof here in controversy to the defendants. Upon receiving their deed, defendants entered into possession of the parcel so conveyed to them, made valuable improvements upon it, and have ever since resided thereon. In March, 1887, the mother, in the name of Elvira B. Wolverton, commenced an action in the superior court of Humboldt county, in which Erastus and his wife, the plaintiff here, Andrew and his wife, the defendants here, and Mrs. Church were made defendants. In her complaint the plaintiff alleged, among other things, that in December, 1878, she was the owner of a described tract of 80 acres of land, and that "reposing a personal confidence in said defendant Erastus J. Baker, and by the mutual consent of said plaintiff and said defendant, and without any valuable or other consideration given or agreed to be given therefor," she, "being of the age of seventy-three years or thereabouts, and infirm in mind and body, and desiring to make a suitable provision for her future support and maintenance, as well as to secure the proper distribution thereof to her heirs at law upon her death, transferred and conveyed the said lands and premises to said defendant Erastus J. Baker, upon the sole and only consideration that the said defendant should hold the same in trust for said plaintiff, and that the rents, issues, and profits and proceeds thereof should be applied in providing for and maintaining said plaintiff during her natural life in a manner suitable to her station and condition in life, and, upon her death, in trust for the benefit of, and to be delivered in equal proportions to, her heirs at law aforesaid;" that Erastus voluntarily accepted the transfer and conveyance, and "agreed with and promised this plaintiff that, in consideration of the transfer and conveyance to him of said lands and premises as aforesaid, he, said defendant, would hold the same in trust for this plaintiff, would apply the rents, issues, profits, and proceeds thereof to the providing for and in maintaining this plaintiff during her natural life, and at her death that he would hold the same in trust for, and would deliver the same to, her heirs at law in equal proportions;" that Erastus accepted the conveyance with intent to wrong, cheat, and defraud the plaintiff out of the title to, and the uses and benefits of, the said lands, and that he had violated his trust by mortgaging the land, filing a homestead thereon, and conveying described portions thereof to the other defendants, who had notice of the trust. And the prayer was that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of the lands described, and that whatever title thereto is held by the defendants, or either of them, is held in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff; that all of the defendants be required to make proper conveyances of the property to the plaintiff; and that the homestead of Erastus and Isabella be declared null and void. The defendants all answered jointly to the complaint, and after trial judgment was entered, in and by which it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff is not the owner of the lands and premises described in the complaint herein, but that defendants, as against the plaintiff, are the owners thereof, in severalty, in fee simple, of the several distinctive pieces or parcels of land mentioned and described in the complaint herein, free and clear of any and all the trusts, exceptions, limitations, and conditions set forth and alleged in said complaint;" and also that the homestead carved out of the land "by the defendant Erastus J. Baker and Isabella L. Baker, his wife, be, and the same is hereby, adjudged a valid homestead, free and clear of any and all the trusts, exceptions, limitations, and conditions set forth in the complaint herein." That judgment was never reversed or modified, and it is the same judgment pleaded by the plaintiff in bar of the defense set up in the cross complaint. While that case was pending, Erastus made, subscribed, and swore to a deposition to be used in the case, and the defendants here introduced that deposition in evidence for the purpose of showing that the trust set up and relied upon by them had been declared by a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee, in a manner sufficient to meet the requirements of section 852 of the Civil Code.

It appears that the deponent, after stating that the lands in controversy in that case were conveyed to him by his mother, without any money consideration paid therefor, gave, among others, answers to questions propounded to him as follows: "Question. On September 28, 1886, Andrew T. Baker, Mary T. Baker, and Mary A. Church conveyed to you certain land, a portion of that property? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. The consideration expressed in that deed is one dollar? A. Yes, sir. Q. For what purpose was that deed made? A. Well, as a settlement between us. Q. Settlement of what? A. Of an interest in the property. Q. Andrew T. Baker had no interest, had he? A. If one had, another had. Q. You have told us already in this examination that the land was conveyed to you for you and Mrs. Church? A. I also told you that some of my brothers thought they ought to have the same interest as the rest of us. Q. That did not affect Andrew T. Baker, did it? A. If one had an interest, my brother had an interest, too. Q. So, then, at the time these deeds were made you considered that all the children of your mother had an interest in the property? A. Yes, sir. Q. At the same time you, Mary T. Baker, and Andrew T. Baker conveyed certain land to Mary A. Church? A. Yes, sir. Q. At that time you recognized the fact that Mary A. Church had a certain interest in that land which stood in your name? A. Yes, sir. Q. At the same time you and Mary A. Church made a deed to Andrew T. Baker and Mary T. Baker? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that deed made for the same purpose? A. The same purpose. Q. Then at that time you recognized the fact that Andrew T. Baker held an interest in that land? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then, if I understand your testimony correctly, at the time these several deeds were made you recognized the fact that you held this land in your name for your sister, your sister-in-law, and your brother? A. Yes, sir. Q. You held it that way for them, and these deeds were made for the purpose of straightening out their several interests? A. Yes, sir; that is what they were for." Mrs. Wolverton, the mother, was called as a witness by defendants, and testified as follows: "Question. What I want to know is, at the time this deed was made to E. J. Baker, what was the consideration of the deed,—why it was,—what it was that induced you to make that deed? Answer. I deeded it to him so that the children could have it after me. It was my wish that the children should have it after I was gone. Q. That was the reason you made this deed to Erastus? A. Yes, sir." The defendants also introduced and read in evidence the several deeds above referred to, between the brothers and sister. The evidence given by the several witnesses on direct and cross examination was quite voluminous, but we have referred above to the most material parts of it.

The first question then is, was it sufficient to justify the findings in relation to the alleged trust? In our opinion, this question must be answered in the affirmative. A valid trust in relation to real property may be declared by a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee. Civil Code, § 852. And the statute will be satisfied if the trust is declared by any writing subscribed by the trustee in which the fiduciary relation between the parties can be clearly read. The writing may be executed simultaneously with or subsequent to the conveyance, and may be of a most informal nature. Letters, recitals, memoranda, affidavits, depositions, and verified pleadings have been held sufficient. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 82; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1007; 2 Reed, St. Fraud, § 845; Garnsey v. Gothard, 90 Cal. 603, 27 Pac. Rep. 516. The deposition read in evidence was a sufficient declaration in writing to satisfy the requirements of the Code, and from it it clearly appears that Erastus took and held the legal title to the land conveyed to him by his mother in trust for his brothers and sister. And this conclusion is greatly strengthened by the fact that he bought out one brother's interest, and voluntaily joined with the other brother and sister in fairly partitioning an equal share in the property to each. It is objected, however, by appellant that, conceding Erastus held the property in trust for his brothers and sister, still it was a trust to be executed only after the death of the mother, and as they proceeded to partition the property before her death they thereby violated the trust, and are entitled to no relief in a court of equity. But the mother is not now complaining that the property was prematurely divided. When she failed in her efforts to get it back for her own use, she ceased to have any interest in its retention by Erastus till her death. And it having been voluntarily divided by Erastus, we do not think he or his wife should now be heard to complain of the division on this ground.

The next question is, did the court err in its rulings upon the admission of evidence? Most of the evidence offered by the defendants was objected to by the plaintiff, and the objections were overruled, and exceptions reserved. It is unnecessary to speak of these rulings separately. We see no material error in them. The evidence was admissible, and the court properly overruled the objections.

In rebuttal the plaintiff offered in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Wolverton v. Baker et al., before referred to. The defendants objected to the offered evidence "on the ground that it did not bind the parties to this suit in any way, shape, manner, or form." The court sustained the objection, and the plaintiff excepted. It is urged for appellant that this ruling was erroneous; "that the judgment roll offered estops the defendants in this action, and should have been admitted in evidence." And it is said: "The question of the same trust between the same parties, and the effect of the judgment, in that case has been determined by this court;" citing Wolverton v. Baker, 86 Cal. 591, 25 Pac. Rep. 54. The case cited was a second action of the mother against her children, in which she again sought to have her deeds to Erastus set aside. The children pleaded in bar of the action the judgment in the first case, and the trial court sustained the plea. In deciding the case on appeal, it was said by the court: "This judgment was palpably erroneous upon the facts found, but nevertheless it prevents a relitigation of the matters determined." And again: "It is a shameful thing that a son should refuse to support his aged mother, after obtaining her property, without consideration, upon the conditions mentioned. But the law must be declared." By the judgment pleaded in bar in that case, and offered in evidence here, it was adjudged that the defendants did not hold the property in trust for the plaintiff, and it was also adjudged "that defendants, as against the plaintiff, are the owners thereof in severalty of the several distinctive pieces or parcels of land mentioned and described in the complaint herein." The plaintiff here was one of the defendants in that action, and, if the judgment can be said to operate at all as an estoppel between the defendants, we think it should be held to estop her from now claiming that the defendants here were not the owners in severalty of the parcel of land mentioned and described as owned by them. There was therefore no prejudicial error in this ruling. Looking at the whole record, we see no good ground for reversal, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

WICKERSHAM v. COMERFORD et al.

(No. 14,782.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATION—ALLOTMENT TO WIDOW—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—ACTION TO SET ASIDE.

1. By a deed of separation a husband conveyed all his lands to his wife, to be her separate estate, free from all claims by him, and the wife gave to the husband money, to be his separate estate, free from all claims from her. Held, that the agreement, both as to separation and division of the common property, was valid, under Civil Code, §§ 158, 159, providing that the husband and wife may enter into any agreement with each other respecting property which either of them might do if unmarried, and that they may, in writing, agree to a separation, which shall not change their legal relations except as to property.

2. In such case, on the death of the husband, the wife would not be entitled to a family allowance out of his estate, under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1465, 1466, 1468, providing that, in case of the husband's death, the husband's estate may be set apart for the surviving wife and minor children, because said sections should be construed as setting apart the husband's estate for the temporary use of the family, and the wife was not a member of the family at the time of the husband's death.

3. A complaint alleged that the wife filed a petition in the probate court to allot to her said estate as a homestead; that the petition stated that the husband had resided on the estate during his lifetime, and that she had resided there since his death, which statement was false, and made with intent to deceive the court; that the petition said nothing about the separation of the parties, which omission was willfully made to mislead the court; that said statement and omission did deceive and mislead the court, and induced it to order the setting apart of the estate to the wife as a homestead, to the prejudice of the plaintiff, who was a creditor of the husband. Held, that the complaint alleges facts constituting a fraud of which plaintiff has a right to complain.

4. The creditor's remedy was not limited to an appeal from the order setting apart the homestead, since the record in such case would not show the debt of the husband to the creditor, or the fraud of the wife, both of which were necessary to the creditor's relief.

5. Nor did the creditor have an adequate remedy by motion to vacate the order, since he could not appeal from an order denying the motion, because the order sought to be vacated was itself an appealable order.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against Sarah Comerford and Philip Comerford to annul an order of court fraudulently obtained to set apart a homestead to defendant Sarah Comerford. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellant. Haskell & Meyer, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to set aside and annul an order of the superior court of Sonoma county, designating and setting apart a homestead to the defendant Sarah, as the widow of Richard Comerford, deceased, on the alleged ground of fraud in its procurement. The court sustained a general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and, as plaintiff declined to amend, gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and contends here that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The complaint shows that on August 11, 1888, Richard Comerford and the defendant Sarah, being husband and wife, executed a written agreement as follows: "That the said parties have agreed, and hereby agree, to live separate and apart from each other henceforth, and to divide the community property between them as herein provided. Sarah Comerford to have the custody of their minor child, Philip P. Comerford, and provide for the support of said child. All the real estate situate in Sonoma county, state of California, which Richard Comerford has hitherto deeded to Sarah Comerford, shall remain and become her separate estate, free from all claim of the said Richard Comerford in law or equity, and he hereby waives all claim to the same as husband, and all right to the same at her death by reason of his relation as husband. He hereby also sells to her all the chattel property now upon the said ranch constituting their present home. The said Richard Comerford also hereby deeds to said Sarah Comerford all lots of land situate in Alameda county now belonging to him, or in which he has any interest, to be and become in like manner her separate estate, free from all claim of the said Richard Comerford; and in consideration of the aforesaid conveyance to her the said Sarah Comerford pays to the said Richard Comerford the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars, gold coin of the United States of America, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the said Richard Comerford, and the said sum shall be the separate estate of the said Richard Comerford, and to it Sarah Comerford relinquishes all right as his wife, in law or equity, or by descent; and each party shall have hereafter no claim upon the other for support or sustenance. The said Richard Comerford to surrender the possession of all the said premises and property to said Sarah Comerford, and leave her in the sole occupation of the same. These presents to bind said parties during their relative lives, unless vacated by the joint deeds of revocation of said parties. In witness whereof, the said parties hereunto set their hands and seals this 11th day of August, 1888. RICHARD COMERFORD. SARAH COMERFORD." That this agreement had been duly acknowledged and recorded in the counties of Sonoma and Alameda. That upon the execution of this agreement the parties thereto immediately separated, and never again lived together. The wife, with her minor son, the defendant Philip, removed to Alameda county, upon the lots described in the agreement as being there situated, and continued to reside there until after the order in question, setting apart to her a homestead, was made, and never, after the execution of said agreement, asked or received any assistance or support from her husband, nor complained that the agreement was not fair. With the $3,500 received by the husband as per agreement he purchased a lot of land in Sonoma county, containing seven acres, a deed for which he procured to be executed to himself and his eldest son, who had remained with him, and on which he resided until February 10, 1890, when he died intestate, leaving no other property than his interest in said lot. On February 18, 1890, the defendant Sarah applied for letters of administration on his estate, and was appointed administratrix on March 3d. On March 6th she published the requisite notice to creditors, and on March 10th filed an inventory of the estate, in which the said lot was described as the only property of the estate. On the day of the filing of the inventory (March 10th) she filed her petition for an order setting apart to her as a homestead the said lot of seven acres, which stated, among other things, "that said decedent, during his lifetime, resided upon said tract of land, and that she had been residing there since his death," but which stated nothing about the deed of separation, nor the fact of separation. Thereafter, on March 24th, the court made the order setting apart the lot to her alone as a homestead, absolutely, and without any limitation as to time. That plaintiff was a creditor of Richard Comerford at the time of his death, and within the time limited by the notice to creditors presented his claim to the administratrix for allowance, and that it was allowed by her on June 4, 1890, and by the judge of the court on June 9, 1890. That plaintiff first learned that the order setting apart the homestead had been made on June 4, 1890,—more than 60 days after that order had been entered. The complaint charges that the statement in the petition for a homestead, to the effect that defendant had resided on the lot of seven acres since the death of her husband, was willfully false, and made with intent to deceive and mislead the court, by falsely suggesting that she had resided upon said lot with her husband immediately before and at the time of his death; and also that she intentionally and willfully suppressed and concealed from the court the said agreement to separate from her husband, and the fact of separation according to the agreement, for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the court; and that such false statement and suggestion as to her residence, and the concealment of the deed and fact of separation, did deceive and mislead the court to believe that she had resided with her husband, as a part of his family, immediately before his death, and that there had been no separation, and thereby induced the court to make the order setting apart the homestead. It is further alleged that plaintiff thereafter moved the court in which the order was made to set it aside on the grounds above stated, and that the court denied this motion.

I think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

1. It seems clear that defendant was not entitled to the homestead which was set apart to her, even for a limited period. In consequence of the agreement of separation, which had been fully executed on the part of the husband, and the fact of separation in accordance with the terms of the agreement, she was not a member of his family at the time of his death, nor at any time after the separation, and therefore, upon his death, was not entitled to a family allowance out of his estate, under sections 1465, 1466, 1468, Code Civil Proc., (Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. Rep. 287, and 88 Cal. 472, 26 Pac. Rep. 361;) and since I think the setting apart of a homestead by the court from the separate property of the husband, as required by section 1465, "for the use of the surviving wife * * * and the minor children, or * * * for the use of the minor children," means the setting of it apart for the temporary use of the family, in the sense in which the word "family" is used in sections 1466 and 1468, it follows that the surviving wife is not entitled to such homestead, unless she had been a member of her husband's family immediately before and at the time of his death. Another consequence of the deed and fact of separation was to deprive the wife of the right to select any part of her husband's separate property as a homestead, under the homestead act, during his life; and it is well settled that "no property can be set apart by the probate court as a homestead, which might not have been dedicated as such under the homestead act immediately preceding the death of the deceased." In re Ackerman, 80 Cal. 208, 22 Pac. Rep.

141; In re Armstrong, 80 Cal. 71, 22 Pac. Rep. 79; Estate of Noah, supra. By the agreement of separation the common property was fairly divided to the satisfaction of both parties, and each party relinquished all right to the share allotted and assigned to the other. As to the share allotted to the husband, ($3,500,) the wife agreed that "the said sum shall be the separate estate of said Richard Comerford, and to it Sarah Comerford relinquishes all right as his wife, in law or equity, or by descent; and each party shall have hereafter no claim upon the other for support or sustenance." I think the agreement, both as to the separation and the division of the common property, was fully authorized by sections 158 and 159 of the Civil Code, and is binding upon the parties, and that the wife thereby absolutely relinquished her right to select as a homestead, during his life, any part of the property thereby alloted to him as his separate estate; and consequently, as above shown, the court had no authority to set apart to her any part of it after his death. In opposition to this view, counsel for respondents cite Eproson v. Wheat, 53 Cal. 715, in which it was held that the agreement of separation in that case did not bar the wife's right to a probate homestead. But in that case the agreement did not divide any property, but merely provided for a separation, and that the husband should pay the wife $100 per annum for her support during his lifetime. The wife relinquished no right to property; and the setting apart to her of a homestead, after his death, was not in contravention of any express or implied term of the agreement.

2. Counsel for respondents claim that the facts stated in the complaint do not constitute fraud of which plaintiff is entitled to complain. The complaint charges a willful suppression of a material truth and the suggestion of a falsehood by defendant, with intent to deceive and mislead the court, to the prejudice of the creditors of the estate, and avers that such suppression and suggestion had the intended effect, to the injury of the plaintiff, who was one of such creditors. I think this constituted fraud. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 901, 919, 1364; Civil Code, §§ 1572, 1710; Estate of Hudson, 63 Cal. 454; Dean v. Superior Court, Id. 474.

3. It is contended that plaintiff's only remedy was an appeal from the order setting apart the homestead. No doubt that order was appealable. But, conceding that plaintiff's relation to the case (that of a mere creditor of the estate, whose claim had not been allowed) was such as would have entitled him to appeal from that order, yet he could have obtained no adequate relief by such appeal, since neither the fraud upon which this action is grounded, nor the fact that plaintiff was a creditor, could have been brought into the record on appeal from that order. Nor did plaintiff have an adequate remedy by motion to vacate the order, even conceding that he was entitled to make such motion, and had made it within the proper time. To say nothing of the disadvantage of trying an issue of fraud on such a motion, he could not have appealed from an order denying the motion, because the order sought to be vacated, viz., the order setting apart the homestead, was itself an appealable order. Railroad Co. v. McGrath, 74 Cal. 49, 15 Pac. Rep. 360; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396. It will hardly be contended that a remedy for the wrongs complained of, thus restricted, is not defective and inadequate, as compared with an original equitable action, adapted to a thorough investigation of the issues, and in which all errors committed by the trial court may be corrected on appeal. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and proceed in the cause.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Haynes, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and proceed in the cause.

DAUBENBISS v. WHITE et al. (No. 14,519.)

Public Lands—Right of Possession—Abandonment—Transference—Ejectment—Findings—Sufficiency of Evidence.

1. An occupant of public land who is ousted by a stranger will not be presumed to have abandoned his right to possession, where, after a contest for a year, he ceases to contend against a superior force maintaining an armed resistance.

2. In ejectment to recover possession of public land, plaintiff claimed under a deed from D., who had occupied the land without color or claim of title. There was no evidence of any act of possession on plaintiff's part, and several witnesses testified that defendants were in possession of the land in July, 1889. Held, that the evidence did not support a finding that D. sold and delivered possession to plaintiff in August.

3. Bare right of possession, without claim or color of title, cannot be transferred by deed, nor otherwise than by the former possessor yielding up or abandoning the possession, and permitting a new possession to be taken by another.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; James F. Breen, Judge.

Ejectment by John Daubenbiss against Amos White and others. The court found in favor of defendants for a part of the land, and in favor of plaintiff for the remainder. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Briggs & Hudner, for appellants. Montgomery & Scott, for respondent.

Haynes, C. In ejectment. Plaintiff bases his right to recover upon prior possession alone. The answer denied plaintiff's possession and his right thereto, alleged prior possession in themselves to part of the land, title in one Robinson to part, and their right to the possession of such part under a lease from the owner. The cause was tried by the court, without a jury. The court found in favor of defendants for the part they held under lease from Robinson, and in favor of plaintiff for the remainder. Defendants moved for a new trial upon a statement, and this appeal is from the judgment, and the order denying a new trial. The transcript does not show the date at which the action was commenced, nor does it state the names of any of the defendants except that of Amos White. We gather from the findings, however, that the other defendants were L. M. Ladd, as administrator of the estate of C. H. Waters, deceased, and William Eastman. Prior to the trial the defendants White and Eastman succeeded to the interest of Waters, deceased. The land sought to be recovered is section 23, township 15 S., range 6 E., M. D., in San Benito county, and situate in the Gabilan mountains. Long prior to 1883, this section and other adjacent sections were in the possession of Root and Martelli, who used the same for grazing purposes, for which alone it was useful. This tract contained about 3,000 acres. In 1883 C. H. Waters acquired all the right of Root and Martelli, and entered into possession, placed improvements thereon, consisting of fencing, houses, and a barn, and pastured his stock on the whole tract. Afterwards Waters let White and Eastman into possession with him, but at what precise date does not clearly appear, and continued in the exclusive possession of the whole tract up to the year 1886, in which year the Dakan Brothers and one Burns acquired possession of sections 14 and 15, lying adjacent to section 23, and in May of that year drove their cattle upon section 23, and expelled Waters' stock therefrom. The court found, upon conflicting evidence, that Waters had a fence, which with the natural barriers inclosed the whole tract of 3,000 acres, but that it was not sufficient to restrain or to turn stock without the aid of herders, and also found that there were fences, which with natural barriers nearly inclosed section 23; that these fences also, at the time of the entry of the Dakans, were generally prostrated, and insufficient, without herders, to turn stock; that the entry of the Dakans upon section 23 "was peaceably effected, and without passing through gates or tearing down fences." There appeared to have been disputes about the possession of other lands besides section 23 between Waters and the Dakans, but touching section 23 the court found: "This latter section continued to be the subject of frequent and grave disputes between the parties. These disputes led to a condition of armed hostility, in which threats of violence were exchanged, firearms were exhibited, and melees indulged in. Continuously throughout this state of affairs, the Dakans maintained themselves in the possession of section 23 by force of arms and superior numbers. Finally, after about a year's contention, Waters recognized the superior might and right of the Dakans to the possession of section 23. The Dakans continued to herd their cattle thereon, and excluded all other stock therefrom until they sold out to the plaintiff. That in August, 1889, the Dakans sold and delivered the possession of section 23 to the plaintiff, who at the time last stated entered upon section 23 with a herd of cattle, and pastured the same thereon, to the exclusion of all others, until September, 1889, when the defendants entered, and ousted plaintiff from the possession, and still exclude him therefrom." The defendants White and Eastman participated in the controversy with the Dakans respecting that section. The pre-emption entry of Robinson was perfected February 18, 1889, and covered the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼, and the E. ½ of N. W. ¼ of said section. The remainder of the land in controversy is government land, to which it is conceded plaintiff has no right unless he acquired a right of possession by an alleged conveyance from Dakan, or by otherwise obtaining a possession prior to that of defendants. Following the formal findings of fact in the transcript is the decision or opinion of the court, consisting of a restatement of many of the facts and conclusions therefrom, and arguments upon questions of law, and following which are conclusions of law "from the foregoing facts and opinion." From this decision, as well as from the findings, it is apparent that the court concluded that the acquiescence of Waters and his associates, the defendants, in Dakan's possession, destroyed his right based on prior possession. In its opinion, the court conceded that relief could not be granted where the plaintiff's possession was a mere scramble, or maintained by force, violence, or threats; but added that this did not continue during the whole time of Dakan's possession. "Peace succeeded the hostilities, and he [Dakan] was not compelled to maintain himself by force or violence during the last year of his occupation;" and that it was not material whether the submission was compulsory and solely in the interest of peace. The findings, thus construed, (and without the comments of the court they could bear no other construction,) do not justify the conclusions of law drawn therefrom, nor support the judgment. It would be monstrous that a right conferred by a prior peaceable possession could be lost after a contest kept up for a full year, simply by ceasing to contend longer with a superior force maintaining an armed occupation. The defendants might have resorted to law, but they were not bound to do so within a week, a month, or a year. They might safely await an opportunity to re-enter peaceably, as they afterwards did. Their cessation from an armed contention cannot be construed as an abandonment of their prior right, and such right could only be lost by abandonment, or by the occupation of Dakan for the period of the statute of limitations. There is no finding, nor any evidence upon which any finding could be based, that defendants' entry, after the alleged possession of plaintiff, was not peaceably made and peaceably maintained.

But aside from this, if the findings as made were sufficient to support the judgment, the fourth finding is not justified by the evidence. This finding is that in August, 1889, the Dakans sold and delivered the possession to plaintiff, and that plaintiff then entered with a herd of cattle, and pastured the same, to the exclusion of all others, until the alleged ouster in September, 1889. Plaintiff testified that he "obtained the land in controversy from William Dakan; received a deed." The deed was offered and received in evidence against defendants' objection. The record nowhere shows the date of the deed, nor when it was delivered, but does show that "it was acknowledged December 14, 1889, after the commencement of the action." The plaintiff further testified that he did nothing to section 23; that he had an agent, his son, thereon, but did not know what he did. The son, F. B. Daubenbiss, testified that he went to this place the 3d or 4th of August, 1889; that as he was on his way to take possession, he met the Dakans with their cattle at Watsonville, 40 or 50 miles from this land; that they (the Dakans) were to keep their cattle there until August 1st, but took them away before he got there, and that he reached the land two days after he met the Dakans at Watsonville. Neither he nor the plaintiff nor any witness testifies that either the plaintiff or his son had any cattle, or ever put any cattle on the land, or that any act of possession was ever performed by or for the plaintiff. The Dakans had neither title nor color nor claim of title to the land. If by their occupation they had acquired any right, it was that of possession simply; a right which was wholly lost by their leaving the land, and removing their stock therefrom. All the circumstances show that they left without any intention of returning, and their leaving under such circumstances was an abandonment, and they could not put the plaintiff in possession after such abandonment. Nor would it aid plaintiff's case if the deed had been delivered, as it possibly was, before the commencement of the action, or when he met the Dakans at Watsonville, or before they left the land, for the reason that a bare right of possession, without claim or color of title, cannot be transferred by deed, nor otherwise than by the former possessor yielding up or abandoning the possession, and permitting a new possession to be taken by another. A deed only transfers title and the incidents flowing from title, or some right, as of possession, where the right depends upon title. In Society v. Dalles City, 107 U. S., at page 344, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672, the court said: "All persons, therefore, who settled upon the public lands acquired no rights thereby, as against the government. They were merely tenants by sufferance. The most they could claim was the right of actual occupancy as against other settlers. Such an occupant could yield his right of actual possession to another settler, but he could convey no other interest in the land. If he abandoned the land, and another settler occupied it, the former lost all right to the possession. If he transferred the possession to another, and the transferee abandoned the land, the first possessor could claim no right in the land unless he again took actual possession." And on page 345, 107 U. S., and page 679, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep., in relation to the transfer in the case then under consideration, the court said: "The method adopted by the appellant to turn over the station to the American Board by an actual transfer of possession was as effectual as any could be. It could be done only by yielding the actual occupancy, and this could not be effected by a written transfer. It could be accomplished only by the going out of one party, and the going in of the other." If it be said that the Dakans had improvements on the land which might be the subject of transfer, the deed was inoperative for that purpose, as it only purported to convey the land, and, being ineffective for that purpose, did not convey or transfer improvements upon the land. Besides, by the abandonment of the land, the Dakans lost all right to the improvements, if any they had. Section 1013 of the Civil Code provides: "When a person affixes his property to the land of another, without an agreement permitting him to remove it, the thing affixed, except as provided in section 1019, belongs to the owner of the land, unless he chooses to require the former to remove it." Section 1019, above referred to, permits a tenant to remove certain things affixed to the premises during the continuance of the term. Not only is there no evidence that plaintiff ever had possession of the land in question, but there is evidence strongly tending to prove that defendants were in possession and had their stock on section 23, in July, 1889. Defendant White testified that in July, 1889, he drove everything off section 23 except his own stock; that he also saw Eastman's cattle on section 23 during the early part of 1889; and that he had been in possession, and had a man on section 23, since July, 1889. Harry Waters testified that in July, 1889, he had helped White drive 150 head of Dakan's cattle off section 23, and saw some of White's cattle on the place at the time. Appellants also attack the finding that the entry of the Dakans was without passing through gates or tearing down fences; and that the fences were generally prostrated. The findings, as well as the evidence, show that Waters and his associates, the present defendants, were in the actual possession of section 23 prior to the entry of the Dakans. It was not at all essential to such actual possession that the land should have been inclosed with a fence sufficient to turn stock, or that it was fenced at all. In McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 246, the court below charged the jury that: "Neither complete inclosures, nor any inclosures at all, are essential to a possession of land. If the claimants, although they had no fences, yet exercised dominion and control over the land, and subjected it to their power, the matter of fences becomes immaterial and unimportant;" and this court, approving the instruction, said: "It is well settled that actual possession of land may be had without fences or inclosure." See, also, Sheldon v. Mull, 67 Cal., at pp. 300, 301, 7 Pac. Rep. 710; Goodrich v. Landigham, 46 Cal., at p. 603. The only importance properly attaching to the fences in the case at bar is that they served to mark, in connection with the use made of the land, the boundaries of the actual possession by the defendants. Any other physical and visible signs, clearly indicating the extent of the possession, would have served the purpose. The fences were erected for the purpose of confining cattle to the range inclosed, and excluding the cattle of others, and, whether sufficient for that purpose or not, clearly marked the extent of their possession. The fact that the Dakans drove their cattle in without tearing down the fence, and drove defendants' cattle therefrom, did not affect the character of their entry. Several exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court on the admission and exclusion of evidence, which should be briefly noticed. The deed from Dakan was, as we have seen, immaterial, whether defective or not, and was improperly received. There is not enough shown in the transcript to enable us to determine whether the exclusion of the certificate of the surveyor general touching White's application to purchase the land described in the certificate was or was not erroneous. Neither the date nor the substance of the certificate is stated, nor does the transcript show that it covered the land in controversy, or any part of it. We find in the opinion of the court a description of the land described in the certificate, and the statement that it was offered for the purpose of proving title. While if offered generally, or for the purpose of proving color of title, it would have been competent, we are not disposed to pass upon a question so defectively presented by the record. It is not necessary, in many cases, to do more than to state in the record the substance of papers offered in evidence, but where any question is raised as to the effect of any written instrument, enough should be stated for that purpose, and if the whole instrument is essential to a proper construction, then it should be set out in full. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

MAGNOLIA & H. FRUIT CANNERY v. GUERNE. (No. 14,302.)

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—LACK OF AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY.

Where the evidence warrants a finding that the attorney who brings a suit for a corporation against one of the stockholders was not authorized by the corporation to do so, it is proper for the court, on motion of defendant, to enter a judgment dismissing the action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; JOHN G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

Action by the Magnolia & Healdsburg Fruit Cannery, a corporation, against George E. Guerne, a stockholder. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellant. Thomas Ruthledge, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. The plaintiff is a corporation; the defendant is one of its stockholders. Defendant moved to dismiss the action upon the ground that it was brought without the authority of plaintiff, and that the attorney who signed the complaint was not the attorney of plaintiff, and had no authority to bring the action. The court granted the motion, and rendered judgment dismissing the action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

It would serve no useful purpose to notice here in detail the evidence upon which the court below acted. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the evidence warranted the finding that the attorney who brought the suit was not authorized by the corporation plaintiff to bring it. That being so, it was proper practice for the court to enter judgment dismissing the action. Turner v. Caruthers, 17 Cal. 431; Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 534.

The judgment is affirmed.

CASTRO et al. v. GAFFEY. (No. 14,252.)

EVICTION OF TENANTS — ACTION FOR DAMAGES — PARTIES.

Plaintiffs entered upon land under an oral agreement with defendant for a lease. The proposed lease was reduced to writing, while plaintiffs were in possession, signed by defendant and one of plaintiffs, and then left with defendant for the other plaintiff to sign, but he never did so, and there was no evidence that he ever accepted the lease, or knew of its existence. Plaintiffs afterwards, having left the premises at the command of defendant, brought an action on the lease. Held, that the action could not be maintained by the plaintiff who had not signed or accepted the lease, and therefore a nonsuit was properly granted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. MCCANN, Judge.

Action by Castro and another against Gaffey to recover damages for eviction from land which plaintiffs alleged they had leased from defendant. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lucas F. Smith, (J. Edward Marks, of counsel,) for appellants. James A. Hall and Cross & Hall, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiffs, in their complaint, allege that on the 14th day of January, 1890, the defendant "entered into an agreement under his hand and seal, whereby he hired, and the plaintiffs leased, for the term of two years," the premises in said complaint described; that defendant in said instrument in writing covenanted with the plaintiffs that they should peaceably and quietly occupy and enjoy the premises and privileges therein set forth and described for the said term of two years. Plaintiffs then allege that they "have not been permitted, peaceably or at all, to occupy and enjoy the possession of said premises; but, on the contrary, after the beginning of the term, on the 15th of January, 1890, the defendant, W. V. Gaffey, who was, at the time of making said lease and entering into said covenant, thereafter the lawful owner of said premises, evicted the plaintiffs from said premises, and has ever since kept them out of the possession of the same, to their damage in the sum of five thousand dollars." Defendant, in his answer, specifically denied all the material allegations of the complaint, including the allegation that plaintiffs had not been permitted peaceably to occupy and enjoy possession of said premises. The issues in said action came on for trial, and the plaintiffs, to maintain the issues on their part, offered in evidence an instrument in writing, signed by the defendant and one of the plaintiffs, which was in form a lease by defendant to plaintiffs of the premises described in the complaint. Defendant objected to its introduction on the ground that it was not signed by both of the parties named as lessees in it. The objection was overruled.

A. C. Castro, one of the plaintiffs, testified "that he and his brother, R. Castro, are the plaintiffs in this action. That about the 1st day of January, 1890, he and his brother, R. Castro, rented a tract of land from the defendant, it being the same land described in the complaint. 'We rented the land for two years, and went out there with Gaffey, and left a sledgehammer there, and fixed some harrow teeth. The lease was to run during the years 1890 and 1891. The proposed lease was reduced to writing while we were in possession, and signed by defendant and myself, and delivered to me in presence of Ed. White as a witness, after which, at the request of the defendant, I left it with him, to be signed by my brother the following day. The defendant, Gaffey, refused to permit us to continue in possession of said premises, and ordered us to leave the premises, as he would have nothing more to do with us. I did $50 worth of work on the premises while in occupation, and expended $100 in money and time in preparing to cultivate said rented premises;' and that none of said money or damages have been paid by defendant to plaintiffs." "During the introduction of plaintiff's testimony the defendant asked leave to introduce the evidence of two of his witnesses out of the regular order, which the court permitted him to do with the consent of plaintiffs. The plaintiffs here rested their case, whereupon the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds that plaintiffs had failed to make out a cause against the defendant; that the lease made by the defendant to plaintiffs, and for the noncompliance with which by the defendant the plaintiffs sue, was a written lease, and was signed by the defendant, Gaffey, and one of the lessees only. The plaintiffs objected to the hearing of said motion, because the defendant had introduced part of his case, whereupon the court suggested to defendant that it would hear said motion, provided defendant would withdraw the testimony introduced by him, to which ruling of the court the plaintiffs then and there duly excepted and still except. Thereupon the defendant withdrew his said testimony, and made his motion for a nonsuit, which was granted by the court, to which ruling of the court plaintiffs then and there duly excepted, and still except, and here assign the same as error."

The ground on which the nonsuit was asked and granted is that the lease on which plaintiffs have their cause of action is signed "by the defendant, Gaffey, and one of the lessees only." A lease signed by the lessor and accepted by the lessee has the same force and effect as it would have if signed by the lessee. But in this case there is no evidence tending to prove that the lease was accepted by the lessees. The only evidence on this point is that of A. C. Castro, one of the plaintiffs, who testified that about the 1st of January, 1890, he and his brother, R. Castro, the other plaintiff, rented the premises of the defendant, and went upon them with defendant, and left a sledgehammer, and fixed some harrow teeth; that the proposed lease was reduced to writing while plaintiffs were in possession, and was signed by defendant and witness, after which, at the request of the defendant, witness says, "I left it with him, to be signed by my brother the following day." The statement on motion for a new trial contains a copy of the lease, which it is stated was produced in court by the defendant, and offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, except a certain part of it. There is no evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff who did not sign the lease ever accepted it, or ever knew of its existence. Plaintiffs were on the premises when the lease was "reduced to writing" and abandoned them when ordered by defendant to do so. It is clear, we think, that the instrument introduced in evidence as a lease was never executed as such, because it was not signed by both of the lessees, nor accepted as a lease by the lessee who did not sign it. The lease contained covenants to be performed by the lessees, other than the one for the payment of rent, and we think the lessor was entitled to have a lease signed by both of the lessees. We do not doubt that, if they had accepted the lease as it is, and had occupied the premises under it, the law would imply a promise to pay the rent reserved, although neither of the lessees had signed the lease; but that is not the case. There is no evidence of an acceptance by R. Castro, one of the lessees. It is quite clear that he should not be permitted to maintain an action upon an unexecuted lease. The motion for a nonsuit was properly granted. Judgment affirmed.

SALMINA v. JURI et al. (No. 14,465.)

TAXATION OF COSTS—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

In an action to declare property assets of a partnership formerly existing between plaintiff and defendant's testator, and to have it sold to pay the debts of the partnership, where the parties are hostile litigants, each employing his own attorney, and contesting the main issues of the case, and the court on finding for plaintiff allows him his legal costs, and commissioner's fee of $131, out of the proceeds of the sale, the court does not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow plaintiff an additional sum of $200 for an attorney's fee.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. HAM, Judge.

Action by Frank Salmina against Louis Juri, executor, and John Even, to declare certain property assets of a partnership formerly existing between plaintiff and Juri's testator, and to have it sold. From a judgment for plaintiff, in so far as it fails to allow him an attorney's fee, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Johnston, for appellant. A. J. Hull and Dennis Spencer, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. Plaintiff averred that he and one Gambetta, now deceased, were partners in the business of farming, dairying, and stock raising; that they owned, as such partners, certain personal property, and also certain land; that in order to raise money for said business they borrowed $2,600 of the defendant Even, and as security therefor executed a mortgage upon said land to said Even; and that, although said mortgage appears upon its face to have been executed by them as tenants in common, it was really executed by them as partners, and for partnership purposes. The history of the alleged partnership, and many facts concerning it, are set forth in the complaint. It is then averred that Gambetta died, and that defendant Juri is his executor; that the said mortgage was not presented to said executor, and that the time for presenting the same has expired; that plaintiff, as surviving partner, has disposed of all the other partnership property, and accounted for the same, and that there is no property other than said land out of which said debt to Even can be paid; and that Even threatens to enforce payment of the whole thereof against plaintiff. The prayer is that the land be adjudged to be partnership assets, and the debt and mortgage partnership liability; and that the land be sold, and the proceeds of the sale be applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt, etc. In the answer of defendant Juri, executor, nearly all the averments of the complaint are denied; and it is particularly denied that said land was partnership assets, or said mortgage debt partnership liability. The prayer of the answer is that plaintiff take nothing by his action. The court found the main issues in favor of plaintiff, and adjudged that the land be sold, and that the proceeds of the sale be applied, first, to the satisfaction of said mortgage, and that the surplus, if any, be divided between plaintiff and defendant Juri. This was accordingly done. There was a surplus, amounting to nearly $4,000, which was divided between said parties. The decree allowed the plaintiff his legal costs; and the fees of the commissioner who sold the land, amounting to $131, were also allowed out of the proceeds of the sale. But the court denied plaintiff's claim for an attorney's fee of $200; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and particularly from that part thereof which denies the attorney's fee. No point is made against the judgment except the refusal to allow said fee. As the real demand in controversy is less than $300, it may be considered somewhat doubtful whether or not this appeal lies; but waiving that question, we see no error committed by the court below in denying the attorney's fee. The general rule is that counsel fees are not recoverable in actions either at law or in equity. In some equity cases they may be awarded at the discretion of the court. In the case at bar the parties were hostile litigants, each employing his own attorney, and contesting the main issues of the case; and it is difficult to see how the successful party is any more entitled to recover his attorneys' fees from his opponent than would be the successful party in any ordinary litigated case. Certainly the court below did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow them.

Judgment affirmed.

SHIRLEY v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF COTTONWOOD SCHOOL DIST. et al. (No 14,348.)

MANDAMUS TO SCHOOL TRUSTEES—WHEN LIES.

Mandamus will not lie to compel school trustees, who have wrongfully dismissed a teacher before the completion of her contract, to issue an order for the full amount of her salary, where no demand was made on them.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Application by Ada Shirley for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of trustees of Cottonwood school district, and E. Moore and others as members, to issue an order for the balance of salary alleged to be due her as a school teacher. A judgment was entered that plaintiff was entitled to a peremptory writ, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. T. Dooling, for appellants. Briggs & Hudner, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment awarding the plaintiff a peremptory writ of mandate, and the case is brought here for review on the judgment roll. The court found the facts of the case to be in substance as follows: In July, 1890, the defendants were the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees, and constituted the board of trustees of Cottonwood school district in San Benito county. The plaintiff was a duly qualified school teacher, and on July 1, 1890, was employed by the defendants to teach the pupils of the Cottonwood school for the term of four months, commencing on the 14th day of that month. She was to receive, and agreed to accept, for her services $60 per month, payable monthly by orders drawn by the board on the county superintendent of schools. At the time named she entered upon the performance of her duties as such teacher, and continued to teach the school until August 23d, a period of six weeks, when the defendants, as such board of trustees, wrongfully and without cause discharged and dismissed her from the school, and prevented her thereafter from teaching the school, and completing her part of the contract. She was ready, willing, able, and competent to teach the school and complete her contract, and repeatedly offered to do so, but the defendants, as such board of trustees, prohibited and prevented her from occupying the schoolhouse and teaching the school after the 23d of August. On August 23d, a majority of the board proposed to her that she teach the school two weeks longer, if at the end of the two weeks she would resign her place as teacher. She assented to this proposition, but demanded as a condition of her resignation that she be paid her salary for the full term of four months. The board refused to pay the full amount, but drew an order in her favor for the sum of $90, the same being in full payment for the time she had already taught. "No demand was made by plaintiff on defendants after the expiration of said four months, nor was any demand for the full term's salary made by her, other than as a condition for her resignation, as above set forth, and such demand was made on August 23, 1890." "Said discharge of plaintiff was for the alleged cause of incompetency as a teacher, and for cruel and unusual punishment of a pupil, but plaintiff was during all of said time competent as a teacher, and performed and fulfilled her duties properly as such, and did not punish said child either in a cruel or unusual manner, nor for any purpose except for just cause, and to a moderate extent, but said board of trustees in discharging plaintiff acted under the honest belief that plaintiff had punished the child excessively, and in a cruel and unusual manner." The court further found that the sum of $150 was due the plaintiff, and unpaid, for the balance of her salary under her contract, and as conclusions of law: "That plaintiff by the wrongful acts of defendants in ignoring the contract, and expelling plaintiff from said school, was exonerated from making formal demand for the issuance of an order on the superintendent of schools. That plaintiff is entitled to the peremptory writ of mandate compelling defendants, as said board of trustees, to issue to plaintiff the order upon the said superintendent of schools of San Benito county for the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, but without costs." Judgment was accordingly so entered. It is alleged in the complaint, and not denied, that, notwithstanding the action of the trustees in discharging her, plaintiff entered another house within the school district, and convenient for the pupils living therein, and taught the pupils of the district continuously from the time of her discharge up to October 31st, making full four months' service as a teacher, and thus fulfilling her contract. It is also alleged "that at the expiration of said four months plaintiff demanded of and from said defendants, the said board, that they issue to her the order for the amount due to her upon the county superintendent for payment thereof, but said board refused, and still refuses, to issue said order, or to pay the same, or any part thereof." And it is said in the brief filed on behalf of respondent that such a demand was in fact made. The allegation was, however, denied by the answer, and the finding upon it cannot therefore be controverted here. Upon the facts shown it is entirely clear that respondent was entitled to full payment for her four months' service; for as said in Webster v. Wade, 19 Cal. 291, "the law is well settled that where a contract for service is made for a fixed period, if the employer discharge the servant before the termination, without good cause, he is still liable, and the servant may recover the stipulated wages." The appellants, however, contend—and this is the only point made for a reversal of the judgment—that the respondent was not entitled to the relief demanded, for the reason that no express demand was made upon them to perform the act sought to be enforced before the proceedings were instituted. This point seems to be well taken. In People v. Romero, 18 Cal. 90, the court, by FIELD, C. J., said: "To authorize a mandamus it must appear not only that the performance of the act, to enforce which the writ is asked, is a duty resulting from the office, trust, or station of the party to whom the writ is to be directed, but that the performance has been requested and refused." And the learned justice then quoted with approval from Tapp. Mand., as follows: "It is an imperative rule of the law of mandamus that, previously to the making of the application to the court for a writ to command the performance of any particular act, an express and distinct demand or request to perform it must have been made by the prosecutor to the defendant, who must have refused to comply with such demand, either in direct terms, or by conduct from which a refusal can be conclusively implied; it being due to the defendant to have the option of either doing, or refusing to do, that which is required of him, before an application shall be made to the court for the purpose of compelling him." This language was again quoted with approval in Oroville & V. R. Co. v. Plumas County, 37 Cal. 362, and the same rule was declared in Price v. Land Co., 56 Cal. 434. The rule thus declared seems to be general, and to apply to all cases, except when the thing to be done is a duty to the public in which the petitioner has no special interest. "In such case," it has been said, "the law itself stands in lieu of a demand, and the omission to perform the required duty in place of a refusal." High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 13. The court below based its conclusion, as we have seen, upon the fact "that plaintiff, by the wrongful acts of defendants in ignoring the contract, and expelling plaintiff from said school, was exonerated from making formal demand." But we do not think this conclusion can be sustained. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; TEMPLE, C.

(3 Cal. Unrep. 609)

BULLOCK et al. v. CONSUMERS' LUMBER CO. (No. 14,813.)

JURY TRIAL—WAIVER OF RIGHT—CONTRACT—INTERPRETATION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS BY OFFICERS OF CORPORATION—SALE—INSPECTION OF LOGS.

1. Though both parties to an action which Code Civil Proc. § 592, provides must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived, waive the trial by jury, the court has the right to call a jury for the trial of the cause.

2. In an action on a contract for saw logs sold and delivered, the controversy was as to the meaning of a clause in the contract which stated that the logs were "to be scaled by licensed scalers by the quarter scale, with ten per cent. deducted for waste." It was claimed that the terms "by the quarter scale" and "for waste" were technical terms, having a particular meaning in the locality where the timber was sold, and testimony of the licensed scalers was introduced to show their meaning. Held, that testimony of the one who made the contract on behalf of defendant, as to what he understood by the terms at the time he made the contract, was inadmissible.

3. Defendant offered to prove by the same witness that by reason of his belief as to the terms of the contract he agreed to pay one dollar per thousand more for the logs than he would otherwise have paid, and also offered to show from the "mill tally" the quantity of merchantable lumber obtained from the logs. Held, that this evidence was properly excluded, the price as well as the mode of ascertaining the quantity of lumber being fixed by the contract.

4. Defendant offered to prove that the words "for waste" in the contract were understood by both parties to mean the cut of the saw after the logs had been squared by the quarter scale, with all deductions for rot, rotten knots, sap, and shakes. Held, that the evidence was not admissible, unless defendant could show that those terms in the agreement have a technical meaning, and apply simply to the cut of the saw.

5. The president and managing agent of a corporation have authority to make admissions in regard to the fulfillment of contracts which will be evidence against the corporation.

6. Where a contract provides that the logs shall be scaled by a licensed scaler, an officer authorized to pass on the merchantable character of logs, both parties, in the absence of fraud, are bound by his decision.

7. Even if the purchaser was not bound by the inspection and decision of the scaler, yet if the defects which rendered the logs unmerchantable were plain and readily seen on ordinary observation, and there was no fraud on the part of the seller, and the purchaser, having full opportunity to observe the defects, made no objection, he would be bound by his acceptance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by N. Bullock, assignee of D. H. McFarland, and Harvey Pinkerton, against the Consumers' Lumber Company, to recover for saw logs furnished defendant corporation under a contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. H. Chamberlin and J. W. Turner, for appellant. Ernest Sevier, Coonan & Sevier, and Ford & Burnell, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was tried before a jury, plaintiffs had judgment against the defendant, (a corporation,) and this appeal is taken from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Both parties waived a jury trial, but the court, against the protest and objection of the defendant, called a jury. An exception was taken by the defendant, and this action of the court is assigned for error. Appellant contends that this action of the court was an irregularity which deprived defendant of a fair trial, and also that it was an error of law occurring at the trial, and cites sections 214 and 592 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 592 provides that certain actions therein named (of which this was one) "must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived or a reference ordered. * * * In other cases, issues of fact must be tried by the court, subject to its power to order any such issue to be tried by a jury." Section 681, Code Civil Proc., provides how and when a jury may be waived. This question was before the court in Doll v. Anderson, 27 Cal. 249. The court said, at page 251: "The court, however, has the right, notwithstanding such waiver, to direct an issue of fact to be tried by a jury. Besides this, it would not be presumed that any injury had accrued to the plaintiff in consequence of the issues of fact being tried by a jury instead of the court." The action there, as in the case at bar, was upon a contract. In McCarthy v. Railroad Co., 15 Mo. App. 385, the action was upon contract. Section 3600, Rev. St. Mo. 1879, provided: "An issue of fact in an action for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial be waived or a reference ordered." The court said: "The right of trial by jury is deemed a valuable right, and is guarantied in actions of law by our constitution. The effect of the above statute is merely to allow the parties to waive that right, if they should see fit to do so; but they do not extend so far as to oblige the judge to try the issues of fact in a case at law, although requested to do so by both parties, if he should deem it a proper case for trial by jury. * * * Not only is there no abuse of discretion in this case, but, as the question is here presented, the very statement of it seems to suggest its answer. The trial by jury is the constitutional mode of ascertaining the facts in actions at law. Both parties were willing to waive this mode of trial, but the judge was not willing to take upon himself the burden of determining the facts, for reasons which were within his own breast, and which he was not bound to disclose. What more is it, then, than the case of one party to an action at law objecting that the facts were tried and ascertained in the usual mode pointed out by the constitution and laws?" Counsel do not cite any authority, and I know of none, that tends to sustain their contention.

This action was brought to recover a balance alleged to be due from defendant under a contract made September 1, 1890, wherein said lumber company (a corporation) was named as the first party, and McFarland and Pinkerton as the second parties. The question in dispute arose as to the proper construction of that part of said contract, which reads as follows: "That said party of the first part agrees to buy from the parties of the second part five hundred thousand (500,000) feet of redwood lumber in logs, said logs to be delivered at the mouth of Dean's slough on or before the first day of January, 1891. Said logs are to be scaled by a licensed scaler, by the quarter scale, with ten per cent. deducted for waste; only merchantable timber to be sold or bought under this contract. Said party of the first part agrees to pay for said logs when each 100,000 feet is delivered, and the whole to be paid in five installments. Said parties of the second part agree to sell and deliver said 500,000 feet of merchantable lumber in logs to the party of the first part at the mouth of Dean's slough on or before January 1, 1891."

Plaintiffs under this contract delivered at the place and within the time named a quantity of merchantable saw logs, which were scaled by licensed scalers by the "quarter scale," and were found to contain, after deducting 10 per cent. for waste, the quantity required by the contract. The defendant contends that the contract required plaintiffs to furnish logs containing 500,000 feet of merchantable lumber; that, in addition to a deduction of 10 per cent. of the scale for waste, there must be an allowance for "rot, rotten knots, sap, and shakes," which would require a further reduction of 35 to 50 per cent.; "that the term 'quarter scale' had a local meaning peculiar to Humboldt bay and nowhere else, and meant that each log should be squared at its smallest end, then deduct for the sawdust and saw kerf, then throw off for rot, rotten knots, sap, shakes, and other defects, and the residue of the logs merchantable lumber;" and that the word "waste" had a local meaning, and meant the deduction under the "quarter scale" for the saw kerf.

A large number of exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, and to instructions given to the jury, and to requests to instruct, which were refused. Most of the exceptions, however, go to the question as to what is the proper construction to be given to the contract, and the decision of that question disposes of nearly all there is in the case, including the objection to any evidence being given by the plaintiffs, upon the ground that "the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action;" for only upon the theory that the contract required the plaintiffs to furnish "500,000 feet of merchantable lumber in logs" could the complaint be deemed insufficient. Appellant rests its contention mainly upon an alleged local meaning of the term "quarter scale." This term is used, in an act of the legislature passed in 1878, (Laws 1877-78, p. 779, § 4,) entitled "An act for the scaling of logs in the county of Humboldt," as "the rule known in the county of Humboldt as the quarter scale." This act also provided for the appointment by the board of supervisors of three or more surveyors of logs, who were required to take an oath of office, and to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties, and who were to have the exclusive right to survey for hire all logs that might be required by any buyer or seller; and said act also defined a merchantable redwood log "to be at least sixteen inches in diameter at the smallest end, and at least twelve feet and two inches long."

Plaintiffs called as witnesses the two licensed scalers, McAdam and McMillan, who were employed by the parties and scaled the logs in question, each scaling a part. These witnesses testified in chief that they scaled the logs in question by the quarter scale, and, after deducting 10 per cent. for waste, they contained 500,000 feet. The scale bills, which were put in evidence, were made in duplicate, and one copy delivered to each of the parties at the time the logs were scaled. Upon cross-examination by defendant's counsel, Mr. McAdam testified that he measured the logs the way he understood the contract, a copy of which he had when he made the survey; that it seemed to him to be very plain how he should measure them. He was asked by counsel for defendant if he did not ignore that clause of the contract which said, "Nothing but merchantable timber to be bought or sold under this contract;" to which the witness replied, "I would understand that to mean merchantable saw logs. Merchantable timber is not merchantable lumber." The witness, upon cross-examination, explained that "the term 'quarter scale' has a meaning among loggers, millmen, and scalers. It is a rule laid down to determine the amount of square-edged boards contained in any log, without regard to its quality. By the quarter scale, a log is squared from its smallest end. The balance of the contents of the log is merchantable. If a log is not sound, scale it just the same;" and illustrated the operation as follows: "This log is 40 inches in diameter and 12 feet long. To square that would make it 30 inches in diameter, which would bring it to a square. That would be 30 inches square and 12 feet long, with 900 feet in it. The sawdust would have to come out of that, and saw scarf. There is generally enough on the outside to make up for the saw scarf. That is the quarter scale." The other scaler, McMillan, upon cross-examination by defendant's counsel, said that the "quarter scale" was simply the name of a scale. That under it the diameter of the log was taken, say sixty inches; one-quarter of the diameter was taken off, which would leave forty-five inches, the square of the log. No other witnesses testified as to the meaning of the term "quarter scale."

Some questions put to witnesses for defendant, intended to have some bearing upon the meaning of that term, were excluded by the court, and require attention. A. W. Graham, who made the contract in question on behalf of defendant, was called as a witness by defendant, and was asked what he understood, at the time he made the contract, by the terms, "said logs to be scaled by a licensed scaler, by the quarter scale, with 10 per cent. deducted for waste." An objection by plaintiffs was sustained by the court; and counsel for defendant then offered to prove by the witness that he (the witness) understood that language in the contract to mean that the logs were to be scaled by the quarter scale in accordance with the custom of Humboldt bay; rot, rotten knots, sap, and shakes to be thrown out to make merchantable timber out of the scale, with 10 per cent. in addition to be thrown out. An objection was sustained to this offer, and defendant excepted to both rulings.

The ruling was right. If the contract, through fraud or the mutual mistake of the parties, did not express their intention, it might have been revised on the application of the party aggrieved so as to express that intention, (Civil Code, § 3399;) but no mistake or misunderstanding was alleged in defendant's answer. Defendant stood upon the interpretation of the contract which the law would have put upon it. The first answer was a general denial; and for a second answer and counterclaim defendant set out the contract in full, and alleged, as a breach on the part of the plaintiffs, that they did not deliver, as required by the terms of said contract, any other or greater amount of "merchantable timber" than 312,000 feet, and claimed damages in the sum of $2,000. It is clear, therefore, that defendant did not claim that anything was omitted from the written contract which was intended to be inserted, or anything inserted that was not intended; for, if the counterclaim means anything, it meant that, under the construction they gave to the contract as written, they were entitled to 500,000 feet of merchantable lumber instead of merchantable logs. The rule is established, not only by the authorities, but by the Code, that, "when a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible, * * *" (Civil Code, § 1639;) and "technical words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate," (Id. § 1645.) If, therefore, the terms "quarter scale" and "waste," used in this contract, are to be regarded as technical terms, or as terms having a special signification given to them by local usage, proof can only be made of such local usage, or of the sense in which they were usually understood, and the testimony of a party as to how he understood them is immaterial and incompetent.

Defendant, after having put a question which was excluded, offered to prove by the same witness that, by reason of his belief as to the terms of the contract, he agreed to pay a dollar per thousand more for the logs than he otherwise would have paid. The refusal of the court to permit this evidence was proper, as was also the refusal of the court to permit the defendant to show by the "mill tally" the quantity of merchantable lumber obtained from these logs. The price, as well as the mode of ascertaining the quantity and quality of the lumber, was fixed by the contract, and could not be changed by the belief of the witness, or by the quantity of lumber of a quality not provided for in the contract, however it might be ascertained. Defendant also offered to prove, by a witness on the stand, that the words "for waste" in the contract was understood by both parties to mean the cut of the saw after the logs had been squared by the quarter scale, with all deductions for rot, rotten knots, sap, and shakes. Upon plaintiff's objecting to the proof, the court ruled that he would sustain the objection, "unless defendant could show that those terms in the agreement have a technical meaning, and apply simply to the cut of the saw." No evidence of that character having been given or offered, the ruling was correct. If the testimony sought to be introduced by defendant were admissible, written contracts would be subject to all the doubts and uncertainties and opportunities for equivocation that attend oral contracts, and the rule in regard to the interpretation of written instruments would be virtually abrogated. Code Civil Proc. § 1856. In the absence of technical words or phrases, whose meaning is obscure, the office of interpretation belongs to the court. In Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. at page 344, the court, after saying that the execution, authenticity, and delivery of a written instrument are usually proved by parol, said: "But evidence of the declarations of the promisee as to his intention in taking the contract in that form, and as to his understanding of the meaning and construction of its terms, could have no effect in giving a construction to the instrument, as the court was bound to construe it according to its terms, and could not be aided by the declarations of the parties made at the time." See, also, Platt v. Jones, 43 Cal. at page 223; Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. at page 11, 27 Pac. Rep. 423; Dwight v. Insurance Co., 103 N. Y. 341, 8 N. E. Rep. 654.

Mr. McFarland, one of the plaintiffs, (whose assignee in insolvency, N. Bullock, was afterwards substituted in his stead,) was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs, and was asked the following question: "Did either the managing agent of the defendant, or its president or secretary, after the removal of the logs from the slough, ever admit to you the receipt of the five hundred thousand feet of lumber in logs provided to be delivered under this contract?" To this question defendant interposed two objections: "(1) That it was not shown that any person was authorized to make an admission which would bind defendant; and (2) that there was an express warranty upon the face of the contract that survives the acceptance of the property." The objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "Both of them did." At the time the question was put, there was no evidence to show the authority of these persons to make admissions which would be evidence against the corporation defendant, other than their official designations specified in the question. That the president and managing agent were so authorized, I think may be presumed, inasmuch as a corporation can only act through its agents, and such authority in matters pertaining to the ordinary business of the corporation is implied in the designation of those officers. Whether the secretary may be presumed to have such authority it is not necessary to decide, for the reason that evidence was afterwards given tending to show that he, with the president, conducted the business of the company at that time; and besides, the exclusion of the evidence could not have affected the result of the case; so that if the ruling was erroneous, so far as it related to this officer, the error was not prejudicial.

As to the second branch of the objection, the warranty only extended to the species of timber, "redwood," and that "only merchantable timber was to be sold or bought under this contract." The contract, however, provided that the logs should be scaled by a licensed scaler, an officer who was authorized to pass upon the merchantable character of the logs, and by his decision both parties were bound, in the absence of some fraud or artifice practiced upon the vendee by the vendor resulting in injury to the latter. It was not the case of an implied warranty, which arises in cases of sale for future delivery, where the buyer has no opportunity for inspection, but an inspection was provided for and had. But, if defendant was not bound by the inspection and decision of the scaler, yet, if the defects which rendered the logs unmerchantable were patent, plain, and readily seen upon ordinary observation, as the evidence in the case tends to show was the fact, and there was no fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, and the defendant had full opportnity to observe their defects, and made no objection, they would be bound by such acceptance. The conclusions reached as to the exceptions to evidence herein specifically noticed apply to a very large number of other exceptions, which raise the same or similar questions, and also apply to the exceptions taken to the instructions given to the jury and to instructions refused. The motion for new trial was properly denied. The evidence was amply sufficient to justify the verdict. It was expressly admitted that the quantity specified in the contract had been received, according to the scale actually made. If that scale, therefore, conformed to a proper construction of the contract, as we think it did, there was no conflict in the evidence as to the full performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiffs. The exceptions to the instruction given to the jury, as well as those refused, all involved the questions we have discussed, and do not require further notice. Finding no prejudicial error in the record, I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

96 Cal. 448

In re SPENCER'S ESTATE. (No. 13,967.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1892.)

WILLS—PROBATE AND CONTEST—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL.

1. An order denying a motion for a new trial in a contested will case is appealable. Estate of Bauquier, 26 Pac. Rep. 178, 88 Cal. 302, followed.

2. Where the verdict and judgment would have been the same, even though the court had ruled and instructed throughout the trial as asked by appellant, the judgment will not be reversed, though some errors have occurred.

3. The fact that testatrix had a strong dislike to her daughter-in-law, contestant's mother, whom her son had married against her wishes, and who had always repelled her advances towards a reconciliation, is not evidence of insanity.

4. The fact that one believes in spiritualism is not proof of one's insanity.

5. It is not error for a court, in charging a jury, to quote from decisions of courts in other cases, provided the quotations correctly state the law.

6. Where the execution of the will was fully and clearly proven, and there was no evidence to the contrary, a charge that "there is no evidence tending to show that said instrument [the will] was not executed and attested according to law," if erroneous, as charging in respect to a matter of fact, is immaterial.

7. Where in an instruction the word "yes" is used instead of "no," but the instruction itself and the other instructions show clearly that the mistake was inadvertent, the jury could not have been misled by it, and it is not material error.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Proceeding by Rufus Homer Spencer, by his guardian, to contest the probate of the will of Mary C. Spencer, deceased. From a judgment admitting the will to probate, and denying a motion for a new trial, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Henley & Oates, for appellant. A. B. Ware and T. J. Geary, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from a probate order denying a motion for a new trial in a contested will case. Counsel for respondents argue very elaborately that the said order is not appealable; but although the provisions of the Code about appeals from probate orders are not as clear as they might be, it must be held as settled practice since the decision in Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. Rep. 178, that, when there has been a regular contest over the probate of a will, an appeal lies from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

Mary C. Spencer died in January, 1888. In September, 1884, she made a will,—duly executed,—in which she gave all her property, except five dollars, to her daughter Ida McDannel and May McDannel, the infant daughter of the said Ida, with a provision also for other daughters of said Ida, if any such should thereafter be born. At the date of the will said Ida McDannel was the only living child of said testatrix. There had, however, been another child of the testatrix, a son named Homer T. Spencer, who had died before the date of the will. He had married a lady whose maiden name was Ella Murphy; and there had been born to said Homer and Ella a son named Rufus Homer Spencer, who at the date of the will was about one year old. To this son the testatrix gave by her will five dollars; and he, by his guardian, contested the probate of the will upon the ground that at the time the will was made "she, the said Mary C. Spencer, was not of sound and disposing mind." There were other grounds of contest which need not be noticed. The main issue was submitted to a jury, who found in favor of the validity of the will, and judgment was entered admitting it to probate. The contestant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the order denying his motion. The record presents nearly 100 alleged errors committed by the court in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, and in instructing the jury. Some of these will be briefly referred to hereafter; but it is difficult to conceive how the verdict and judgment could have been different if the court had ruled throughout the trial as asked by appellant. And in such a case a judgment will not be reversed, even though some errors have occurred during the progress of the trial. Estate of Briswalter, 72 Cal. 107, 13 Pac. Rep. 164; Green v. Ophir, etc., Co., 45 Cal. 522; Levitzky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 299.

There is no pretense that Mrs. Spencer was of unsound mind in any general sense. It appears clearly that she was a woman of excellent judgment and discretion in the ordinary affairs of life. She must have had exceedingly good business capacity; for thrown suddenly on her own resources, with but little property, and that heavily incumbered, she managed to raise her children well, giving her son, at least, an expensive education, and to accumulate quite a little fortune. None of the friends and acquaintances who had known her for many years—and there were more than a score of them who testified—ever had a suspicion of her insanity. It is claimed, however,—and this is the main contention in the case,—that she was insane in one particular, namely, in her dislike to her daughter-in-law Ella, the mother of contestant. There is no doubt that the testatrix had a dislike of her daughter-in-law; but there is no evidence that would have justified the jury in finding that such dislike was the result of an insane delusion, or any form of insanity. She disliked Ella's family. She had a notion that the Murphys were beneath her, morally and socially. Whether or not this notion was well founded is immaterial. She had a very high estimation of the worth of her son Homer, and was very much attached to him. She had raised him very carefully, and had expended a great deal of money, for a woman in her circumstances, on his education. He appears to have been a bright and promising young man, and her motherly affection no doubt somewhat exaggerated his virtues. She expected him to cut quite a figure in the world. When she discovered the probability of his marrying, at the early age of 21 years, a member of what she considered an inferior family, to which she had a great aversion, she was greatly chagrined and provoked. The circumstances of the marriage also added to her discomfiture. It was not supposed that the marriage would take place at any early date; but the family of the daughter-in-law having removed to San Francisco, Homer went there from Santa Rosa, somewhat hurriedly, and was married to Ella without the knowledge of the testatrix. She did not hear of it until a considerable time afterwards, and then learned of it accidentally. Ella testified that this was not the fault of herself or her family, that he had informed his mother, and that the latter was expected at the wedding. Nevertheless, the mother was not so informed. One or two witnesses—not intimate friends of the testatrix, however—testified that she said that Homer was entrapped into the marriage. If she did make such a statement, it was not, under the circumstances, any evidence of an unsound mind. A couple of weeks after the marriage, Homer and Ella visited Santa Rosa for a week, and did not go to see Mrs. Spencer. Afterwards the latter made overtures for a reconciliation. She wrote to Homer, asking him and Ella to visit her and attend the christening of her granddaughter May McDannel. Ella replied coldly, refusing the invitation. She testified at the trial that the letter was written at Homer's request. Afterwards there was a partial reconciliation. Homer coming of age, his mother wanted him confirmed, according to the custom of the Episcopal Church; and upon her invitation Homer and Ella visited her, and she at that time treated Ella kindly. Soon thereafter Homer lost his health, and his mother went to San Francisco and helped to nurse him. Afterwards he was removed to her home at Santa Rosa, where he died. During his last illness his mother and Ella were brought into contact, and did not get along very well. After the funeral of Homer they never saw each other. Ella never sent the grandchild to see the grandmother. There is nothing in the evidence against the character of Ella; but she evidently did not make much effort to effect a reconciliation with her mother-in-law. The foregoing is only a meager statement of the history of the relations between the persons named; but taking all the details as they appear in the long transcript, there is nothing to show anything like mental unsoundness or monomania on the part of the testatrix. It is quite probable that the conduct of Homer in various matters caused her to attach blame to Ella, when it should have fallen on Homer himself; but she did not know the real facts. She believed the son, whom she loved, rather than the daughter-in-law, whom she disliked and mistrusted; but would not any sane mother, under the circumstances, have done the same? The likes and dislikes of human beings—their confidences and mistrusts—are often capricious and arbitrary; but they are not evidences of insanity because they cannot be logically defended to the satisfaction of those who think them wrong. In the case at bar there is no warrant for the claim that the testatrix's dislike of her daughter-in-law and her family was an insane delusion. It was simply such a feeling, arising out of the recondite principles of attraction and repulsion, as is quite common among people of undoubted sanity. And it can hardly be said even that the will was in any way unreasonable. She was much attached to her only living child, Mrs. McDannel, and to the infant daughter of the latter; she had a partiality for girls, saying that boys could take care of themselves; she had been offered no opportunity of becoming attached to the contestant, as he had been kept away from her; and it is not improbable that she thought he would be provided for by other relatives. But even if we could consider the will as unjust, it would make no difference. In disposing of her property, she was not called upon to consult the wishes or views of juries or courts. Her own will was supreme. "The right of a testator to dispose of his estate depends neither on the justice of his prejudices nor the soundness of his reasoning. He may do what he will with his own; and if there be no defect of testamentary capacity, and no undue influence or fraud, the law gives effect to his will, though its provisions are unreasonable and unjust." Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y. 157.

There is some claim made that Mrs. Spencer was a spiritualist, and therefore insane. In the first place, the evidence does not show that she was a spiritualist, but merely that at one time she took an interest in investigating spiritualism, and was disposed to accept some of its claims. She always remained a member and devoted adherent to the Episcopal Church. In the second place, spiritualism is not itself insanity. And in the third place, there is not the slightest evidence that any views which she may have had on the subject of spiritualism had anything to do with the making of her will.

It was testified by one or two witnesses—not intimate friends of the testatrix—that Mrs. Spencer said that contestant was not Homer's child. It is clear, however, that she had no such belief. She always recognized him as Homer's son, offered to raise and educate him, and declared him in her will itself to be such son. But if she had, once or twice, made the statement sworn to, it would have been, under the circumstances appearing in the transcript, no evidence of insanity, although it would have been undoubtedly a mistake. What Mrs. Spencer is reported to have said about excessive sexual indulgence needs no comment.

With respect to alleged errors in law committed at the trial, we are not able to see any that could have been at all prejudicial to appellant. To many of the rulings no exceptions were taken. Contestant put a long question, covering between six and seven pages of the printed transcript, to his witness Dr. Smith. It contained a number of things which the witness knew about Mrs. Spencer from his own acquaintance with her, and a great many other propositions put in a hypothetical form. An objection to this question was sustained, and there was no exception to this ruling. Afterwards an objection was sustained to a somewhat similar question on the ground that the facts within the witness' knowledge should be separated from the hypothetical part of the question, and exception was taken. But the witness then went on, and testified both as to his knowledge of Mrs. Spencer and as to his opinion upon the hypothetical statement, and it cannot be seen how the ruling of the court was of any consequence. Most of the other exceptions to the rulings on evidence were where appellant sought to prove declarations of Homer made to his wife and others. All this was clearly hearsay and immaterial, and the rulings of the court were correct. It was offered mainly to explain and vindicate the conduct of Ella; but her conduct and character were not on trial. Moreover, she did afterwards testify very fully as to the matters first excluded. We perceive no other rulings on the admissibility of evidence which need special notice.

We have carefully examined the lengthy charge of the court to the jury, including what the court said of its own motion, and instructions given at request of parties. It covers about 35 pages of the printed manuscript; and it is a difficult task to construct a charge of that length without including in it some errors. In the present case, however, a great deal of the charge is repetition of the same matter; and it is sufficient to say that a close inspection of it discloses no material error. It is not error for a court, in charging a jury, to quote from decisions of courts in other cases, provided the quotations correctly state the law.

It is contended that the court erred in instructing that "there is no evidence tending to show that said instrument [the will] was not executed and attested according to law." If it be conceded that this was erroneous, as charging in respect to a matter of fact, still, as the execution of the will was fully and clearly proven, and there was no evidence to the contrary, no possible harm could have been done by the instruction. In such a case the verdict will not be disturbed. Levitzky v. Canning and Green v. Ophir, etc., Co., supra.

Of the instructions asked by appellant, 21 were refused; and the refusal of each one is assigned as error. We have examined these rejected instructions, and find that those parts of them which are correct appear in the instructions given. Two other instructions asked by appellant were slightly amended by the court, and then given; and we see no errors in the amendments. For instruction No. 25 the word "yes" is used by mistake instead of "no;" but the instruction itself, and the other instructions, show clearly that the mistake was merely one of inadvertence, and it could not have misled the jury. We see no reason for more particular comment upon the numerous assignments of error; for the evidence against the soundness of the testratrix's mind at the time of the execution of the will was so slender that the verdict must have been the same under any rulings which a respectable court could have been expected to make.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

ELECTRIC IMP. CO. v. SAN JOSE & S. C. R. CO. (No. 14,423.)

VERDICT — SPECIFYING AMOUNT OF RECOVERY — ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 626, provides that where a defendant establishes a claim for the recovery of money, in an action for the recovery of money, greater than the claim established by plaintiff, the jury must find the amount of the recovery. Held, that a verdict for defendant "for its costs" is not within the meaning of the statute, because such a verdict is for costs only, and there is no recovery by either party.

2. In an action to recover for services by plaintiff in constructing an electric railroad for defendant, and for damages by reason of defendant's failure to perform its part of the contract, defendant set up by way of counterclaim that plaintiff had abandoned the contract before completing the road, and it appeared that the road had been sold in an uncompleted state. Held, that evidence of the price for which it was sold was inadmissible, since such evidence would not affect the amount of damages defendant would be entitled to by reason of plaintiff's failure to complete the road.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action on a contract by the Electric Improvement Company against the San Jose & Santa Clara Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haggin, Van Ness & Dibble, for appellant. F. B. Laine and Jackson Hatch, for appellee.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover $1,196.59, alleged to be due from defendant under a contract for the construction and electrical equipment of a street railroad from San Jose to Santa Clara, and the further sum of $17,328.49 damages for an alleged refusal and neglect of the defendant to perform its part of said contract. The answer denied defendant's alleged failure to perform its contract, and that anything was due plaintiff; and by way of counterclaim alleged that plaintiff quit and abandoned the contract, to defendant's damage in the sum of $100,000. The cause was tried before a jury, which rendered the following verdict: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find a verdict for the defendant for its costs." Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the defendant for its costs in the sum of $273.50. Plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, and moved thereon for a new trial, which was denied, and appeals from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Appellant contends for a reversal upon two grounds:

1. That the verdict is void, and insufficient to support the judgment, for the reason that it fails to specify the amount to be recovered. Section 626 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "When a verdict is found for the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of money, or for the defendant when a counterclaim for the recovery of money is established, exceeding the amount of the plaintiff's claim as established, the jury must also find the amount of the recovery." If the jury find nothing in favor of the plaintiff, and did not find in favor of the defendant upon its counterclaim an amount exceeding the amount established by the plaintiff, the verdict would necessarily be for the defendant, and the defendant, on such verdict, would be entitled to costs. In such case the jury could not specify the amount of any recovery, for there was no recovery by either party. There is nothing in the record to indicate that a different verdict was intended by the jury, or that it was based upon any other ground. The addition of the words, "for its costs," was harmless surplusage. The verdict, without this addition, would have given costs to the defendant, and hence the plaintiff was not prejudiced. Watson v. Damon, 54 Cal. 278, cited by appellant, is not in point. There the jury found for the plaintiff $2,250, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum from a given date, less the amount of notes of the value of $950, "with interest on said notes;" but neither the verdict nor the pleadings gave any basis for the computation of the interest on the notes. In Redmond v. Weismann, 77 Cal. 423, 20 Pac. Rep. 544, the verdict was: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the plaintiff." In that case the amount of plaintiff's claim stated in his complaint was not in controversy; the sole controversy being as to the liability of the defendant. This court refused to send it back for a new trial, judgment having been entered for the amount stated in the complaint.

2. Appellant's second point is that the court erred in not permitting the question, "For how much?" The pleadings show that the road was only partly constructed under the contract. The only recital in the bill of exceptions explanatory of the ground upon which the question was based is the following: "During the trial defendant was allowed to introduce, in support of its counterclaim for damages, evidence of the entire cost of the road constructed by it under the contract set forth in the pleadings. Whereupon Jacob Rich, a witness, and a director and treasurer of defendant, was asked by Mr. Haggin, (counsel for plaintiff:) 'Question. Has the San Jose and Santa Clara Railroad Company sold its road?' Answer. Yes, sir. Q. For how much?'" Defendant's objection that it was irrelevant and immaterial was sustained. Appellant insisted that, if defendant sold the road for more than it had paid out, it could not have been a loss to it. The contract required the plaintiff to furnish certain electrical supplies, and to construct certain work. It was not a contract for manufacturing or furnishing certain articles for sale, but for the construction of a railway for use. The cost of the work, so far as it had proceeded, might tend to prove, where the plaintiff abandoned the work before completion, that it would cost the defendant more than the contract price to complete the work the plaintiff had contracted to do, and so aid the jury in determining one item of the damage sustained by the defendant. That, and the loss of the use of the railway for the time the construction was delayed by plaintiff's breach, would ordinarily be the measure of defendant's loss; and a profit made by the sale of the road could not affect the amount of the defendant's recovery in such case. Counsel for appellant, in their brief, insist that the evidence of the entire cost of the road, so far as constructed, necessarily created the impression upon the jury that, if the road was a failure, and utterly worthless, the defendant's loss was the amount expended; but the record does not disclose any evidence tending to show that defendant claimed the work done to be worthless. We think the question was properly denied; but, if it was error, appellant was not prejudiced, as the jury did not award damages to the defendant. We find no prejudicial error in the record, and therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

GOLLIN v. LYLE. (No. 14,294.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL.

A motion for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, is addressed to the discretion of the court, and its judgment thereon will not be disturbed unless clearly abused.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Ejectment by Walter W. Gollin against Mary E. Lyle. There was a verdict for defendant. From an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan, (W. H. L. Barnes, of counsel,) for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action of ejectment. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. The jury found in favor of defendant; and the court below, upon motion regularly made by plaintiff, granted a new trial. The defendant appeals from the order granting a new trial. The motion was made upon the ground, among others, of the "insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict;" and that was the main ground upon which the motion was granted, as appears from an opinion delivered by the trial judge. In such a case the trial court has a wide discretion, and we do not disturb its rulings, unless it clearly appears to us that such discretion has been abused; and it is quite clear that there was no such abuse of discretion in the case at bar.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HANSON v. CORDANO et al. (No. 14,733.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

Under Civil Code, § 1479, subd. 1, providing that if an act of performance by a debtor under several obligations is made with the intention or desire that such performance should be applied to the extinction of any particular obligation, manifested to the creditor at the time, it must be so applied, a payment made to a material man by a builder, who intended at the time, as the former knew, to settle a debt for building supplies, cannot be applied towards an earlier debt of the builder.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action by Albert Hanson, as assignee of a mechanic's lien on the land of Stephen Cordano, to enforce the lien for a part of the price of building material supplied by Charles Hanson, the assignor, to the builder. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan and T. C. Van Ness, (L. A. Redman, of counsel,) for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action for the enforcement of a material man's lien. The court below rendered judgment for defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll, there being no bill of exceptions. The court found that the amount of money for which appellant claims a lien had been fully paid and satisfied, and the main question in the case is about the application of certain payments.

The facts necessary to be stated, as they appear in the findings, are these: The respondent Cordano, being the owner of certain land, made a written contract with one MacBain, by which the latter, for the sum of $7,100, was to construct a building on said land. The contract was recorded as required by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. MacBain bought of Charles Hanson lumber and materials of the value of $1,879.75, to be used in, and which were used in, the construction of said building. During the course of the construction of the building Cordano made several payments of money to MacBain upon said contract, and of the identical money so paid by Cordano to MacBain the latter paid to Hanson the full amount due him for said lumber and materials. Cordano, supposing that all demands and liens had been satisfied, paid the balance of the contract price to MacBain a short time before the expiration of 35 days after the completion of the building. But Hanson afterwards claimed that MacBain did not make any application of the payments made by him to Hanson, and that he, Hanson, applied said payments, except $506.09, to a former debt owing to him by MacBain. Hanson filed a lien for the alleged balance due, viz., $1,318.66. He assigned the lien to the plaintiff, Albert Hanson.

As there is no evidence before us, we must be governed entirely by the findings of the court. The business was done with and the payments made to a certain agent of Hanson, and the finding of the court on the point in question is as follows: "That said agent, at the several times he received said three payments hereinbefore found from said MacBain, well knew that said moneys were paid by said Cordano on said contract to said MacBain, and that said MacBain intended said payments to be applied on account of said lumber and materials so furnished for said building; and that he, MacBain, believed that they were being so applied by said Charles Hanson and his said agent." It appears, therefore, from the finding that at the times when the payments were made the debtor intended them to be applied upon the indebtedness incurred for the materials furnished for the Cordano building, and that the creditor "well knew" that the debtor so intended. Nothing further was necessary to fix the application. The Code[1] merely provides that "the intention or desire of the debtor that such performance should be applied to the extinction of any particular obligation be manifested to the creditor;" and the mode by which the debtor in the case at bar manifested his intention is immaterial, provided that "at the time" he intended to make a particular application, and the creditor "well knew" it. This view of the case makes it unnecessary to notice the point that the lien was not filed in time, or any of the other points made by the respondents. Judgment affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. CITY OF EUREKA. (No. 14,475.)

Presumptions on Appeal — Record — Application for New Trial — Amendment of Statement—Evidence.

1. Where the statement of a case appears to have been duly presented, settled, and allowed by the court, and is a part of the record, it must be presumed, on appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial, that it was used on the hearing of the motion for such new trial, nothing to the contrary appearing.

2. A statement, certified by the judge as correct, is not open, on appeal, to the objection that it does not contain all the evidence.

3. There is no error in allowing a party on the settlement of the statement to amend such statement by signing it.

4. When an appeal is taken by defendant, and he serves on plaintiff's attorneys a statement, indorsed, "Defendant's statement of the case," and such service is accepted without objection, plaintiff's attorneys cannot be misled by the omission of the signature of defendant or his attorneys.

5. There is no error in allowing a party to insert, in the proposed statement of the case, a request for its settlement and allowance, where such request is necessary to the validity of the statement, though the time for filing such statement has expired.

6. Where the charge of the court in a case is not in the record, it must be presumed, on appeal that proper instructions were given on all matters connected with the subject-matter of the action.

7. In an action to abate a nuisance, it is not error to exclude an answer to the question: "How, in your opinion as an expert, would that plastering be in the condition that you found it, had the building, since the plastering was placed there, settled six or seven inches?" since it must appear to any one that the plaster of a building which has settled six or seven inches cannot be in the condition that it was before the building settled.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Charles Richardson against the city of Eureka to abate a nuisance and to recover damages occasioned by the obstruction of a natural water course flowing across plaintiff's land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. N. Gillett, for appellant. E. W. Wilson and J. W. Turner, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to abate a nuisance, and to recover damages occasioned by the obstruction of a natural water course flowing across the plaintiff's land. The obstruction complained of consists of an embankment erected in grading a street in the city of Eureka across the natural water course referred to. A motion was made to dismiss the appeal, but the same was denied, (92 Cal. 64, 28 Pac. Rep. 102,) the court saying: "Any defects alleged to exist in the statement of the case will be considered when the cause comes before us upon its merits." It is urged that the statement ought not to be considered because it does not appear by any indorsement of the judge thereon that it was used on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and that it does not contain or purport to contain all the evidence. Neither of these objections is well taken. The statement appears to have been duly presented, settled, and allowed by the court. It is a part of the record, and we must presume that it was used on the hearing of the motion, there being nothing to the contrary shown. There is no merit in the contention that the statement does not contain all the evidence. The certificate of the judge that the statement is correct is sufficient.

It is also contended that the statement was not authenticated. This contention is based upon the fact that it was not signed by the moving party or his attorneys. Objection was made on that ground to the settlement of the statement, whereupon the attorneys for the moving party asked permission to amend the statement by signing the same. This request was granted, and properly so. The statement as presented to the attorneys for the respondent was indorsed, "Defendant's statement of the case," and service thereof was accepted without objection. The attorneys for the respondent could not have been misled by the omission.

It is claimed, also, that the court erred in allowing the moving party to insert in the proposed statement a request for its settlement and allowance. If such matter was essential to the validity of the statement, there was no error in the ruling of the court, although the amendment was made after the time for filing the statement had expired. Low v. McCallan, 64 Cal. 2, 27 Pac. Rep. 787; Macadamizing Co. v. Williams, 70 Cal. 538, 12 Pac. Rep. 530.

It was alleged in the complaint that the waters which were caused to be thrown back upon plaintiff's property by the embankment in the street were the waters of a natural water course. The answer in effect admitted that there had been a natural water course across plaintiff's property, but averred that "for a long time prior thereto it had and now has no defined course or channel by reason of the improvements made in said city; that lots over and through which it formerly passed had been filled in, and buildings have been constructed thereon; that streets have been graded over and along said waterway, and the water flowing therein now runs through culverts and in sewers." Upon the issue thus raised there was a sharp conflict of evidence. If it was a natural water course, the city was not authorized to place any obstruction across the channel without taking the necessary precautions for the escape of the water flowing therein. There is evidence tending to show that the city attempted to do this by the construction of a sewer, but the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff tended to prove that this sewer had been changed or abandoned, and that no proper channel of escape had been provided in lieu thereof. The charge of the court to the jury is not in the record, and we must presume that proper instructions were given upon all matters connected with the subject of the action.

We do not think the court erred in sustaining the objection to the question: "Now, in your opinion as an expert, would that plastering be in the condition that you found it, had the building since the plastering was placed there settled six or seven inches?" It must be apparent to any one that the plaster of a building which has settled six or seven inches cannot be in the condition that it was before it settled.

There are other exceptions argued by counsel for appellant, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss them in this opinion. We have examined them, and think there is no merit in any of them.

Judgment and order affirmed.

BERLIN v. FARWELL. (No. 14,467.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

BROKERS—COMPENSATION—ACTING FOR BOTH PARTIES.

Where the evidence shows that plaintiff in an action to recover commissions earned under a contract to find a purchaser for defendant's land was employed by the purchaser without defendant's knowledge to buy the land from defendant at a figure which would suit the purchaser's views, a finding that he was the purchaser's agent was proper, though he had no written agreement with the purchaser for compensation, but was to get his compensation from defendant; and, being the agent of both parties without defendant's knowledge, he cannot recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Action by C. H. Berlin against Elizabeth Farwell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Berlin and D. M. Smoot, for appellant. Haven & Haven, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought against the defendant for the purpose of recovering certain commissions alleged to have been earned by the plaintiff in finding a purchaser in the person of Mr. H. D. Bacon for certain lands which Mrs. Farwell had in writing trusted to the plaintiff to sell for her at a certain price. The court below determined the matter adversely to the plaintiff's claim, and from the judgment made and given in the premises this appeal is taken upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff and appellant claims that the court below was not justified by the evidence in making the seventh finding of facts, and that the conclusions of law are not warranted by the findings. Upon the disposition of these matters the appeal is to be determined. The finding referred to reads thus: "Seventh. That prior to the 22d day of September, 1889, and thence to and at the time of the authorization of plaintiff by defendant to sell said land, by writing, signed by her on said 22d day of September, 1889, and thence to the time and at the time of the receipt by defendant from plaintiff, on the 25th day of September, 1889, of said sum of $500 as a deposit by said H. D. Bacon on account of his proposed purchase of said land from defendant, the plaintiff had been and was acting as the agent of said H. D. Bacon in the matter of the proposed purchase by the said H. D. Bacon from the defendant of said land. That in securing from the defendant the said written authorization of sale of date September 22, 1889, the plaintiff was acting at the request and as the agent of said H. D. Bacon; and in the payment to defendant, on the 25th day of September, 1889, of the sum of $500 on account of said proposed purchase, the plaintiff was acting at the request and as the agent of said H. D. Bacon." The conclusions of law run thus: "That the plaintiff is not entitled to take anything from the defendant by this action, and that the defendant is entitled to recover from the plaintiff her costs." The court below was evidently of the belief, and the facts as found and shown in evidence warrant such belief, that the plaintiff was working in the interests of Mr. Bacon, and was employed by him to do so, although the agent had no written agreement for compensation from Mr. Bacon, but was to get his compensation from Mrs. Farwell; and that the agent was acting in the interests of Mr. Bacon, the proposed purchaser, in endeavoring to get Mrs. Farwell to sell the property at a figure which would meet Mr. Bacon's views, without the knowledge of Mrs. Farwell, from whom he obtained a written agreement for compensation in case he sold the property to Bacon for her. To this extent, at least, the plaintiff was the agent of both parties; and the sole question left for determination is whether, under such state of facts as here exist, the plaintiff can hold the defendant responsible for the commissions claimed in this action. It was said in Kronenberger v. Fricke, 22 Ill. App. 550: "It is a well-established rule of the law of agency that an agent must not put himself, during the continuance of his agency, in a position which is adverse to that of his principal, for the principal bargains for the exercise of all the skill, ability, and industry of the agent, and he is entitled to demand the exercise of all this in his own favor. * * * For this reason an agent of the seller cannot become the agent of the purchaser in the same transaction. As a consequence of this rule it is held that a person who attempts to act as the agent of both parties to a transaction, without disclosing such fact to his principals, is precluded from recovering compensation for his services." To much the same effect is a similar matter treated in Carman v. Beach, 63 N. Y. 97. In Farnsworth v. Hemmer, 1 Allen, 494, a broker negotiating an exchange of real estate acted for both parties without informing either that he was employed by the other. It was held that he was not legally entitled to commissions for his services, the court saying: "It is of the essence of his contract that he will use his best skill and judgment to promote the interest of his employer. This he cannot do where he acts for two persons whose interests are essentially adverse. He is therefore guilty of a breach of his contract." We conclude, therefore, that the conclusions of law are proper under all the findings; and, as heretofore stated, the challenged finding being supported by the evidence, it follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: Temple, C.; Belcher, C.

DORN et al. v. CRANK. (No. 19,160.)

Appealable Order.

The receiver of an insolvent street-railway company applied for permission to issue certificates of the company to pay for paving which it was obliged by law to lay near its tracks. The contract, to be approved by the court, provided that the work was to be paid for in cash or certificates issued by order of the court. Holders of the first mortgage bonds of the company intervening protested against the issuance of the certificates, and asked that if issued they should be made subordinate to the liens of their bonds. The court denied their petition, approved the contract, and the interveners appealed, and applied for a writ of supersedeas to stay the issuance of the certificates pending the appeal. Held, that the application is premature where the court did not direct the issuance of the certificates, or refuse to declare them subordinate to the liens securing the bonds.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Wade, Judge.

Application for a writ of supersedeas by Dorn and McKee, trustees, and interveners in an action by Russell against the Pacific Railway Company, whose receiver was J. F. Crank. Writ denied.

John D. Pope, for appellants. John D. Bicknell, Wilson Lamme, J. H. Polk, and J. F. Smith, for respondent.

Paterson, J. The property of the Pacific Railway Company was placed in the hands of the respondent, Crank, as receiver. Prior to the appointment of the receiver, the company had been operating a horse-car line in the city of Los Angeles, under a lease from the East & West Los Angeles Street Railway Company to the predecessor of the insolvent defendant. The lease provided for the payment of an annual rental of $10,000, but no payments have ever been made on account thereof, and the receiver is unable to make any payments on account of the lease. The municipal authorities have recently ordered Figueroa street to be paved, and under the law the horse-car company is required to pave between its tracks, and for two feet on the outside thereof. The receiver, having no funds with which to do the work, presented a petition to the court below, accompanied by a contract for the paving, and providing for payment in certificates to be issued by the receiver of the insolvent railway company. The interveners, who hold a large amount of first mortgage bonds on the cable line, protested against the issuance of the certificates to pay for paving the street, and asked that, in case the certificates were issued, they should be made subordinate to the liens securing the bonds held by them. The court denied their petition, and directed the acceptance of a bid for the work, and approved the contract providing for the issuance of receiver's certificates. To this order the interveners excepted; a bill of exceptions was presented and allowed; notice of appeal was served and filed; and two undertakings on appeal, each in the sum of $300, were given. This is an application for a writ of supersedeas to stay the issuance of the certificates pending the appeal. We think that the application is premature. The court has done nothing thus far except to approve the contract entered into by the receiver for the performance of the work. That contract provides that "all payments under this contract are to be made in cash, or, at the option of the party of the second part, in receiver's certificates issued by the court. * * * This contract is made by the parties hereto with the express understanding that the same is subject to the approval of the judge of the superior court." The court has not directed the issuance of any certificate, nor has it refused to declare that the receiver's certificates, if issued, shall be subordinate to the lien created by the deed of trust. Until the certificates have been issued, and the court has adjudicated that they shall not be subordinate to the lien of the interveners, the latter have no grounds of complaint.

The application is denied.

Dismissal of Appeal by Consent—Right to Hearing Below.

Where interveners apply for a supersedeas, which is denied as premature, and consent that their appeal from the order may be dismissed, they are entitled to a hearing on the merits of their intervention in the court below.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Application for directions on dismissal of appeal. For former report, see ubi supra.

John D. Pope, for appellants. John D. Bicknell, Wilson & Lamme, J. H. Polk, and J. F. Smith, for respondent.

Paterson, J. In a recent decision in this case (see ubi supra) we held that the application for a supersedeas was premature, and upon that ground denied the motion. The correctness of the decision is conceded, and appellants consent that the appeal from the order may be dismissed, but are apprehensive that the court below may again refuse to give them a hearing, and deny their right to be heard in opposition to the issuance of receiver's certificates. We are asked, therefore, to so direct the court that they may be heard on the merits of any objection which they may make to further proceedings in the matter. We do not deem it necessary to make any order, except to dismiss the appeal, but to prevent any misunderstanding it may be well to state that the interveners are entitled to a hearing in the court below on the question whether receiver's certificates should be issued to pay for the proposed work. The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

FISH v. McCARTHY. (No. 14,986.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PROPERTY OF MINORS—WHEN SUBJECT.

Where a mechanic performs work on the property of minors under a contract with the guardian, the mechanic's lien cannot be enforced, where the guardian has not obtained an order of the court authorizing her to do the work.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Joseph W. Fish against Mary McCarthy, guardian of Mary, Joseph, and Patrick Powers, to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. Stafford & Stafford, for appellee.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a mechanic's lien. The court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment passed for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contends that his complaint was sufficient. The complaint shows that the defendant, Mary McCarthy, in her character of guardian of the persons and estates of Mary, Joseph, and Patrick Powers, minors, employed the plaintiff to repair a certain building, the property of her wards; that plaintiff repaired the building and furnished all materials necessary for that purpose; that the materials and labor were reasonably worth $120; and that he regularly filed with the recorder his claim and notice of lien. The wards are also made defendants, but the guardian is sued only in her official capacity. I think the following opinion of the learned judge of the trial court expresses the law of the case, and should be adopted: "This is an action to enforce a mechanic's lien. The work performed, materials furnished, for the value of which the lien is sought to be enforced, was performed as per notice for the defendant, Mary McCarthy, guardian of the persons and estates of certain minors, who are also joined as parties defendant. Assuming that the allegation in question is equivalent to an averment that the defendant, McCarthy, as guardian of the minor defendants, and on their behalf, made the contract in question, it seems clear that the defendant, as such guardian, could not subject the estate and property of her wards to a lien, such as is here sought to be enforced, without first obtaining an order of court authorizing her to do so. The supreme court of this state in Guy v. Du Uprey, 16 Cal. 196, have directly so held; and the same rule is maintained by other courts. See Phil. Mech. Liens, § 111; also Hunt v. Maldonado, 89 Cal. 636, 27 Pac. Rep. 56. As the mechanic's lien arises from work done and materials furnished under an obligatory contract, if the contract be not binding the lien necessarily fails. An infant is not bound by his contract, except in certain cases, in which the erection of a building is not included." See, also, Phil. Mech. Liens, § 108; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 351. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

ANGEVINE v. KNOX-GOODRICH. (No. 14,803.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD — INJURY TO TENANT'S HEALTH — DEFECTIVE SEWER.

Civil Code, § 1941, requiring the lessor to put buildings intended for human occupation in a condition fit for occupancy, does not create such an implied warranty that a tenement is fit for human occupation as to render the lessor liable to the tenant for injury to his health resulting from a defective sewer, where the lessor had no notice of the defect.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action by M. B. Angevine against S. L. Knox-Goodrich. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch and B. F. Bergen, for appellant. A. S. Kittredge and Morehouse & Tuttle, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff demanded damages from the defendant for injury to his health, caused by the neglect of the defendant to construct a house with safe and proper sewage pipes and conduits, which house was occupied by the plaintiff as an employe of the lessees of the defendant. Following the verdict of the jury, judgment for $8,500 was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial upon various grounds, and it was granted, without any specification as to the ground moving the court thereto. The respondent contends that the trial court erred in its rulings upon the demurrer to the complaint, in the admission of evidence, and in the charge to the jury; and in this connection it is urged that the trial court in all these matters took an erroneous view of the force and effect of section 1941 of the Civil Code, in that it was ruled by that tribunal that under such section there was virtually written into every lease of the kind here involved, by operation of the statute, even though not expressed in the lease or a covenant, that the premises leased are habitable, and fit for occupation by human beings, if intended for habitation; and that, as a consequence, if such building or structure is not in such condition, the covenant is broken, and an action for damages such as here instituted will lie. Such evidently was the view taken and expressed by the court in all these matters, and such view is not in harmony with the decisions of the supreme court. It is raised in Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. Rep. 260: "Nor was there any liability arising from section 1941 of the Civil Code, which provides that the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must put it in a condition for such occupation. In the first place, it is not alleged or found that the building was intended for the occupation of human beings; and, in the second place, it was held in Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 566, as we understand the decision, that the obligation imposed upon the landlord by section 1941 'should be limited by the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant' by section 1941; and that, therefore, the only consequence of a breach of the landlord's obligation is that the tenant may either vacate the premises, or expend one month's rent towards the repairs, after notice," etc. There is no fraud or deceit on the part of the landlord charged in the complaint, or proved in the case, as we read the transcript. It is a case where the plumbing of the house as constructed was defective, and the illness of the plaintiff was caused by noxious gases that escaped from sewage pipes by reason of this defective plumbing. It is not alleged or proven that the defendant knew anything more about this defect when the lease was made than the plaintiff or his employer, the lessee. But it is sought to make the defendant responsible under the idea that by the Civil Code (section 1941) there is an implied warranty in every lease of a house for the occupancy of human beings that the same is in a habitable condition when leased. This view of the case is not only opposed by the cases we have first cited, but it is in direct conflict with the decision of the appellate court in the case of Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 548, 28 Pac. Rep. 599, where this was said about a somewhat similar contention: "This would be placing the burden of looking out for the health of one's family on the landlord, and leaving the husband and father without any responsibility, therefore, in renting a house for them to live in." If this is the extent of the defendant's responsibility to the tenant, it must be the same with reference to an employe of the tenant, as was the plaintiff here. Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 59, 22 Pac. Rep. 304; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. (8th Ed.) p. 198, § 175. We therefore conclude that the action of the court below was erroneous as to all the matters alluded to as occurring on the trial of the cause, and for these reasons its action in granting a new trial was founded in justice, and was the exercise of a sound judicial discretion. We therefore advise that the order granting a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

CAMERON v. CALBERG. (No. 14,499.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

Plaintiff bought from M. a mare, then pasturing on the land of one W., five miles distant. He went to take possession of the mare, but W. was not at home. On his return he met W., and then arranged with him to remove the mare a few days later, and on the day specified he placed her on another ranch, under an agreement with the manager thereof, who received and held her for plaintiff. Held, that there was a sufficient compliance with Civil Code, § 3440, providing that every transfer of personal property will be deemed to be fraudulent as to creditors, unless accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, of the things transferred.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

Action by Ashley D. Cameron against G. F. Calberg to recover possession of a mare seized at suit of defendant against plaintiff's vendor. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. F. Crane, for appellant. Wells Whitmore and David Stoddart, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action of claim and delivery was instituted to recover possession of a certain mare named "Dolly," claimed to be wrongfully in possession of the defendant. From the judgment rendered in the premises, and from an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken. The only point made for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the evidence does not support the findings. In this connection it is urged that the plaintiff, who had bought the property in question from his father-in-law, Mr. Murr, did not get it in such manner as to satisfy the provisions of section 3440,[1] Civil Code, because, as is claimed, the transfer of the property was not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continuous change of possession. As remarked by this court in Byrnes v. Moore, 93 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. Rep. 70, "every case of the kind here involved has its own peculiar features, and must be determined on the particular facts which surround the given transaction or transfer." Many of the facts in this case are similar to those developed in Williams v. Lerch, 56 Cal. 330, where it was held that the transfer was good. Here the vendee got a bill of sale, and paid a sufficient consideration for the property,—a mare, which was on a pasture in possession of a third party. The purchaser (the plaintiff here) went to get the mare and other horses he had bought, but did not find the party, Weyland, who had them in charge, at home. On that same day, on plaintiff's return to Oakland, his place of residence, the pasture where the mare was being five miles distant, he met Mr. Weyland, the person who had the mare and the plaintiff's other horses in charge on pasturage, and made arrangements to remove all of them on the 2d of April, 1890, to another ranch for pasturage, a few miles off. The vendor, Murr, in pursuance of one of the conditions of the sale, then paid Weyland for the previous pasturage of the mare and other horses he had sold the vendee. Then, on the 2d April, 1890,—only a few days after this,—the plaintiff and a son of the vendor, Murr, and Weyland took the horses that plaintiff had previously owned, the mare in dispute, and other animals bought from the vendor, Murr, and drove them to the Hewston ranch to be pastured. The plaintiff had previously made arrangements with Mr. Harrison, manager of the Hewston ranch, for the pasturage of all the animals above mentioned, and Harrison, in pursuance of that arrangement, received all of the horses, including the mare, from the plaintiff, as the property of the plaintiff, and kept them for him subject to his order, and never heard of, knew, or recognized any one else in the matter; and Harrison, as manager of the ranch, was in the possession of all the animals for the plaintiff from the 2d April, 1890, until the 24th May, 1890, when the mare Dolly was seized at the suit of an attaching creditor of Murr, the vendor, by Calberg, the defendant here, a constable executing the writ. We perceive no error in the action of the court below complained of by appellant, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

[1] Civil Code, § 3440, provides that "every transfer of personal property other than a thing in action * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession."

CURRIER v. NELSON et al. (No. 14,138.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION.

A deed conveying a lot described it as "commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Harrison street, distant 125 feet 'north' of the northeasterly line of Fourth street, and running thence northeasterly along the northwesterly line of Harrison street, 25 feet." Held, that though the word "north," as used to describe the boundaries of land in a conveyance, may be qualified by other words of description used in connection with it, there is nothing in the deed set forth to indicate that "north" was used in any other sense than "due north," and that it must be so held.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Currier against Nelson and others to recover possession of a lot. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Theodore H. Hittell, for appellant. Thos. F. Barry, for appellees.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover possession of a certain lot in San Francisco, which is described in the complaint as "commencing at a point in the northwesterly line of Harrison street, distant one hundred and twenty-five feet northeasterly from the northerly corner of Harrison and Fourth streets, and running thence northeasterly along said northeasterly line of Harrison street twenty-five feet," and extending back from said street a distance of seventy-five feet. The court below gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the record that one Jones was, on September 17, 1879, the owner and in possession of the lot in controversy, and both the plaintiff and defendant Schmalzlen claim to have succeeded to this title. The defendant Schmalzlen claims under a deed executed by Jones on September 17, 1879, and in which the lot conveyed is described as "commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Harrison street, distant one hundred and twenty-five feet north of the northeasterly line of Fourth street, and running thence northeasterly along said northwesterly line of Harrison street twenty-five feet," and extending back from Harrison street a distance of seventy-five feet. The plaintiff's claim of title is based upon a later quitclaim deed executed by Jones, in which the land conveyed is described as in the complaint.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the only matter to be decided upon this appeal is whether the deed of September 17, 1879, under which defendant Schmalzlen claims, describes the land in controversy; and whether that deed does so describe it or not depends entirely upon the meaning of the word "north," as used in its first descriptive call. The first call in the deed referred to is for a point in the northwesterly line of Harrison street 125 feet north of the northeasterly line of Fourth street. The court below found as facts: "Tenth. That Harrison street, in said city and county, runs in a northeasterly and southwesterly direction, and Fourth street, in said city and county, runs at right angles to it, in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction; that the only point in the northwesterly line of said Harrison street, which is one hundred and twenty-five feet due north from the northeasterly line of said Fourth street, is a point on said northwesterly line of Harrison street eighty-eight feet four and three eighths inches northeasterly on said line of Harrison street from the north corner of said Harrison and Fourth streets, and thirty-six feet seven and five eighths inches southwesterly on said line of Harrison street, from the point of commencement of the real estate described in the complaint. Eleventh. That a line drawn due south from the point of commencement of the real estate described in the complaint does not strike the northeasterly line of said Fourth street in a less distance than one hundred and seventy-five feet due south from said point of commencement." In view of these facts, it is clear that if the word "north," as used in the first descriptive call of defendant's deed, is to be construed as meaning "due north," then the land in controversy was not conveyed by that deed, and the judgment in favor of defendants must be reversed. There is no doubt that the word "north" may be controlled or qualified in its meaning by other words of description used in connection with it. If, for instance, the deed here had described the lot as commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Harrison street, 125 feet north of the north corner of Harrison and Fourth streets, there would then have been a necessity to construe the word "north," as thus used, to describe the course of the line between the two points named as meaning "northeasterly," in order to harmonize with the points given for the beginning and ending of such line; but in the case before us there is no room for construction, and the court would not be warranted in giving to the word "north," in the call referred to, any other than its ordinary meaning, as there is nothing whatever in the deed to indicate or suggest that it was used in any other sense. The word "north," unless qualified or controlled by other words, means "due north," and that is its meaning in the deed under consideration. "The term 'northerly' in a grant, where there is no object to direct its inclination to the east or west, must be construed to mean 'north.'" Brandt v. Walton, 1 Johns. 156. See, also, Fratt v. Woodward, 32 Cal. 220; Irwin v. Towne, 42 Cal. 326. It follows from the views we have expressed that the deed under which defendant Schmalzlen claims does not describe the land in controversy. It is not alleged in the answer that the parties to this deed adopted the description which it contains by mistake, and that such deed was intended and believed by them to convey the land which is the subject of this action. If such mistake was made, it may be shown under proper pleadings, and the defendant Schmalzlen should be permitted to amend his answer by setting forth any equitable defense which he may have to this action growing out of such mistake, if it was made.

Judgment and order reversed.

MOORE v. SCHOFIELD et al. (No. 14,810.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

WITNESS—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS.

Where an action against two co-contractors is revived against the administrator of one of defendants, the surviving defendant is not, under Code Civil Proc. § 1880, which forbids a party to an action against an administrator to testify, a competent witness for plaintiff, though judgment has been rendered against such survivor by default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; JOHN CALDWELL, Judge.

Action by David Moore against Miles Schofield and W. S. Chapman. W. S. Chapman defaulted, and Miles Schofield died, and his administrator was substituted in his stead. Judgment for plaintiff against W. S. Chapman and against plaintiff for the administrator. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Gale and S. P. Davidson, for appellant. Goodwin & Goodwin and F. L. Ford, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is upon the judgment roll, which, however, includes a bill of exceptions, settled at the time the decision was made, under section 649, Code Civil Proc. The action was brought to recover $8,400 alleged to be due from the defendants upon a contract made by them with plaintiff, whereby they agreed to purchase certain shares of stock in a mining corporation, upon terms agreed upon. There was also a cause of action set up for moneys laid out and expended for the use of defendants. It was therefore a suit founded upon an alleged joint obligation on the part of the two defendants. After suit brought, Schofield died, and his administrator was substituted in his place. Chapman made default, but the administrator of Schofield answered, denying each material allegation of the complaint, placing his denials on the ground that he had no information or belief on the subject sufficient to enable him to answer. At the trial, plaintiff called as a witness the defendant W. S. Chapman, whose default had been duly entered, and offered to prove by him the contract set forth in his complaint. To this evidence the defendant administrator objected on the ground that the same was incompetent, it appearing that the witness was a party to this action, and therefore incompetent to testify to any fact which occurred prior to the death of Schofield. The objection was sustained, and an exception was taken. Plaintiff then offered himself as a witness for the same purpose, but a similar exception was interposed and sustained. Plaintiff having no further evidence by which to prove the alleged contract, which was not in writing, judgment was entered in favor of the administrator of Schofield, and in favor of plaintiff as against Chapman. The point presented is whether Chapman was a competent witness, under section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the plaintiff, against his codefendant and joint obligor, as to facts which occurred prior to the death of Schofield. The precise question was presented in the case of Blood v. Fairbanks, 50 Cal. 420. In that case Blood and Hewitt, as partners, had taken sheep from the defendant to keep for the increase, etc., agreeing to share the profits with the owner. Hewitt had sold his interest in the partnership to Blood, who brought suit against the administratrix of the estate of Fairbanks, the owner of the sheep, for an accounting. As Hewitt had no interest in the proceeding, and asserted no claim against the estate, although made a party to the suit, it was contended that he was not incompetent, under section 1880, Code Civil Proc. But this court said: "Section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that 'parties to an action or proceeding, or in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator, upon a claim or demand against the estate of the deceased,' cannot be witnesses. It is said that Hewitt is not a party against an executor, and that he has no claim against the estate. But the statute does not merely exclude parties who have or are supposed to have an interest adverse to the estate of the decedent, but, by its terms, renders all nominal parties to the action incompetent." Appellant does not deny that this case is in point, or that it is against him, but he contends that it has been overruled by subsequent cases. He says it renders all nominal parties to proceedings against an administrator incompetent, while the court in Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 52 Cal. 336, held that one against whom an action is prosecuted by an executor or administrator may be a witness. Of course this ruling was based upon the proposition that the action was not against the executor or administrator, and therefore not made an exception to the general rule as to the incompetency of witnesses by the letter of the statute. This case, no less than the former, holds that the very words of the statute must control. Chase v. Evoy, 51 Cal. 618, simply holds that the executor may waive the objection, and make a party a witness in his own behalf.

A more recent case, and apparently more in point for appellant, is Myers v. Reinstein, 67 Cal. 89, 7 Pac. Rep. 192. The question there was whether certain property belonged to the estate. As the court said: "The very question to be determined here is whether the interest sought to be recovered was a part of Reinstein's estate or not." It was an action or proceeding then against an executor to recover property which the executor claimed belonged to the estate. It would indeed seem to be a claim or demand against the estate. But that was the very question upon which the decision was made to turn, and it was held that it was not. Whether right or wrong, therefore, it is not authority here. In Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. Rep. 698, an attorney who was to recover for legal services rendered the decedent was permitted to state his occupation, and how long he had been practicing law, what his income from that source was, etc., as a basis upon which to estimate the value of his services. The court said that the statute was evidently intended to prevent parties from testifying to matters tending to establish an asserted claim, and not to prevent their testifying in reference to other matters which may arise incidentally. It may be said of this case that it is inconsistent with Blood v. Fairbanks, which very distinctly holds that the letter of the statute must control, and the statute makes the test as to the competency of the testimony of a party to the action, whether it relates to facts which occurred before the death of the deceased party; and, further, that in that particular case, if the proposed evidence did not tend to establish the claim, it was immaterial, and should have been excluded on that ground. In fact, I fail to see any reason in the distinction attempted. If the testimony was not material, it should not have been received. If it was, and tended to establish the claim against the estate, no reason can be given for supposing that the statute was not intended to include it. Apparently the idea of the writer of that opinion was that the statute could not be understood as excluding testimony of the parties upon subjects which the deceased could have known nothing of, and which did not refer directly to the transactions from which the cause of action arose. Whether this be so or not cannot help the appellant here, for the rejected testimony in this case was clearly not incidental in any sense, and tended directly to establish the contract on which the claim is based. In the still more recent case of Tyler v. Marye, 95 Cal. 160, 27 Pac. Rep. 160, and 30 Pac. Rep. 196, this section was again alluded to, but it was there held that the evidence received did not tend directly to establish a claim against the estate of the deceased. But on another ground the contention of appellant must be overruled. If it be conceded that the court can look beyond the letter of the statute, and determine whether a given case is within the reason of the rule, it does not appear in this case that Chapman had no interest in establishing the claim against the estate. His own default had been entered, upon which judgment subsequently passed against him. He had an interest in having judgment rendered, thereby compelling the estate to contribute to the satisfaction of the claim. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

In re GUILFOYLE'S WILL. (No. 15,051.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1892.)

WILL—VALIDITY—SUBSCRIPTION BY MARK.

1. Under Civil Code, § 14, defining certain terms, and providing that "'subscription' includes 'mark,' when the person cannot write," where testatrix knew how to write, but was physically too weak to do so, a subscription of her will by mark is sufficient.

2. Civil Code, § 14, requiring the name of the person in such a case to be written near the mark, is sufficiently complied with if the name is written so near as to show that the mark is intended to represent it.

3. In the absence of any allegations of fraud or mental unsoundness, the fact that another person did the writing under these circumstances raises no presumption against the validity of the will.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of Bridget Guilfoyle, deceased. From an order revoking the probate of the will, and appointing an administratrix, proponents and administratrix appeal. Reversed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellants. H. G. Platt and Oscar T. Shuck, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of the deceased. The bill of exceptions shows that the matter was submitted to the court on the following stipulation as to the facts:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the application to revoke the will of the above-named deceased be, and the same is hereby, submitted upon the following statement of facts, to wit: Said will is in pencil, and barely covers a single page of small note paper. It is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"'August 29, 1891. I, Bridget Guilfoyle, leave $500 (five hundred dollars) for masses at St. Patrick; also want a nice funeral, and all other expenses to be paid from what I leave, and the rest to my two nieces, Maria and Aggie Johnson, equally.

"'X.

"'Witnesses: ELLEN O'CONNOR. EMMA ENDRES. MARY DALY.'

"The will was written by the witness Emma Endres, at the request of the deceased. After it was written, the witness Emma Endres read the will to the deceased in the presence of the other subscribing witness. The deceased was then asked whether that was her will. The deceased answered that it was. She was then given a pen by the witness Emma Endres. The deceased knew how to write her name, but was physically too weak to do so. She made a cross at the end of the paper, and declared that such paper was her last will, and requested the said Emma Endres, Mary Daly, and Ellen O'Connor to sign the same as witnesses thereto.

"OSCAR T. SHUCK, and
"H. C. PLATT,
"Attorneys for the Contestants.
"F. J. CASTELHUN,
"Attorney for the Proponents."

From these facts the court concluded "that said document is not subscribed at the end thereof by the testatrix herself, nor did any one in the presence of the testatrix, and by her direction, subscribe the name of the testatrix thereto;" and accordingly revoked its former orders admitting the document to probate, and appointing an administratrix. From these orders revoking the probate and the appointment of an administratrix, the proponents and administratrix bring this appeal.

As to what amounts to a "signing" by a testator under the statute of 29 Car. II., it is said, in Jarman on Wills, (page 201:) "It has been decided that a mark is sufficient and that, notwithstanding the testator is able to write, and though his name does not appear on the face of the will." To the same effect is section 303 of Schouler on Wills, citing American cases. Section 14 of the Civil Code provides that "'signature' or 'subscription,' includes 'mark,' when the person cannot write, his name being written near it, and written by a person who writes his own name as a witness." In this case the whole body of the will, including the name of the testatrix, was written by Emma Endres, who signed as a witness. If the mark can be regarded as subscription by the testatrix, the execution of the will was in perfect accordance with section 1276 of the Civil Code.

It is contended, however, by counsel for respondents that the name of the testatrix, which appears in the body of the will, is not "near" the mark, and therefore that the use of the mark to represent her name was not authorized. The only conceivable object of requiring the name to be written "near" the mark, is to show what name the mark is intended to represent. In this case it clearly appears that the mark was intended to represent the name of the testatrix. It is therefore near enough to her name, as written in the body of the will, to satisfy the requirement of section 14 of the Civil Code.

It is further contended that the mark was unauthorized, because the testatrix knew how to write, though she was physically unable to do so; and, from an extract from the opinion of the learned judge who decided the case, copied into respondents' brief, it would appear that the decision rested upon this ground. The extract is as follows: "In the case at bar it is especially proper to enforce the strict letter of the law, as it appears that the proposed paper was written and witnessed and marked as and for the act of a woman who could write, but who was too ill to even write her name. Wills executed under such conditions are presumably the wills of persons other than the one then actually dying." If the presumption mentioned should be indulged in any case, it surely cannot apply to this case, since there is no allegation of fraud, and no question that the testatrix was of sound and disposing mind at the time she made her mark and declared the instrument to be her will. Persons who know how to write may become physically incapable of writing their names by reason of rheumatism, or paralysis of the hands, and other causes besides general physical debility, though of sound mind; and it seems unreasonable that the legislature intended to exclude all such persons from the privilege of subscribing a will or other instrument by a mark. The language of the Code is, "when the person cannot write." This fairly includes all persons who are unable to write from any cause, even though they know how to write. I think the orders appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders appealed from are reversed.

VERDIER et al. v. ROACH. (No. 13,086.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1892.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — CONTINGENT CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE.

Where a lessor had covenanted to indemnify lessee from damages by water during his term, and the lessor died, a claim on the contract of lease for damages from water, accruing after the death of lessor, and after notice to present claims had expired, is a "contingent" claim, under Code Civil Proc. § 1493, which provides that "claims * * * due, not due, or contingent must be presented to the administrator within the time limited in the notice;" and, under section 1500, no action can be maintained on such a claim unless it is first presented to the administrator.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by Verdier and Moreau against Roach, administrator of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, on a covenant of indemnity in a lease for damages by water in the building. Judgment for defendant, from which plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Gustave Touchard, Jr., for appellants. Napthaly, Frederich & Ackerman, (John A. Wright, of counsel,) for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this cause was pending in department 1, the following opinion was prepared by Commissioner VANCLIEF. After full consideration in bank, we are satisfied with that opinion and with the conclusion therein reached; and for the reasons therein given the judgment is affirmed.

"On the 12th day of November, 1881, Thomas H. Blythe leased to the plaintiffs the first story or ground floor of a building in San Francisco, to be occupied as a store for the term of nine years and ten months. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessor to indemnify the lessees and save them harmless, during the term, from one half of all damages and loss which they might sustain by the leaking or overflow of water upon their goods in the building, caused by any occupant of any part of the building, other than that demised to them. In September, 1882, plaintiffs entered into possession of the demised part of the building, under the lease, and stored their goods therein. On April 4, 1883, Blythe died. On June 12, 1883, Roach was appointed administrator of Blythe's estate, and as such, on June 23, 1883, commenced the publication of notice to the creditors to present and exhibit their claims against the estate within ten months thereafter, which publication was continued and completed as required by law; but during the period of ten months no claim of any kind was presented by plaintiffs. In 1886, more than two years after the expiration of the period of ten months had expired, the plaintiffs sustained damages in the sum of $3,321.10, by a leak and overflow of water caused by an occupant of a portion of the building other than that demised to plaintiffs; and thereupon they demanded of Roach, as administrator, payment of one half of the damages thus suffered by them, viz., $1,660.55, which he refused to pay; and this action was commenced to recover the same. The court found the facts substantially as above stated, and gave judgment for the defendant, solely upon the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to present to the administrator any claim upon the covenant in the lease, during the period of ten months after publication of notice to creditors. Plaintiffs bring this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and contend that, upon the findings of fact, the judgment should have been for plaintiffs.

"Was it necessary to a recovery by the plaintiffs that they should have presented to the administrator a claim against the estate, upon the covenant in the lease, during the prescribed period of ten months? is the principal question presented for decision. Section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that 'all claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever: provided, however, that when it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant, to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof, that the claimant had no notice as provided in this chapter, by reason of being out of the state, it may be presented at any time before a decree of distribution is entered.' Section 1500 provides that 'no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator,' except an action to enforce a mortgage or lien, etc., where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint. Section 1493 is the Code substitute for section 130 of the old probate act, which provided that, 'if a claim be not presented within ten months after the first publication of the notice, it shall be barred forever: provided, if it be not then due, or if it be contingent, it may be presented within ten months after it shall become due or absolute.' As affecting contingent claims, this section of the probate act was construed, to a certain extent, in Pico v. De la Guerra, 18 Cal. 428, where it was said: 'We see in the one hundred and thirtieth section no authority for the presentation of a contingent claim. The plain effect of the section is to ignore all claims which are due, unless such claims be presented as therein described; and the last clause of the section is simply a proviso, exempting claims not due and contingent claims from the operation of the first clause, and making a new provision for them, namely, that they may be presented within ten months after becoming absolute liabilities or reaching maturity. But this does not do away with the necessity of presenting them to the executor after this character attaches to them.' Accordingly, it was held in that case that no action could be maintained against an executor upon a contingent claim until after it had been presented to the executor as a matured absolute claim. As if purposely and unmistakably to reverse the effect of this construction, section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure not only provided that 'all claims arising upon contracts, whether due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice,' or barred forever, but entirely omits the proviso in section 130 of the probate act upon which the above construction was grounded, viz., that a contingent claim might be presented within ten months after it should become absolute; and there is now no provision in the Code for the presentation of a contingent claim after the expiration of the period of ten months, except in case the holder of the claim was absent from the state, etc., and this exception applies alike to all claims, whether contingent or not.

"Section 131 of the probate act required every claim presented to be supported by an affidavit 'that the amount is justly due,' etc. Such an affidavit could not truthfully be made in the case of a contingent claim before the happening of the contingency upon which the claim was to become due or absolute. As if on purpose to remove this obstacle to the presentation of contingent claims, section 1494 of the Code (substitute for section 131 of the probate act) requires the affidavit to be made only in case the claim 'is due,' and provides that 'if the claim be not due when presented, or be contingent, the particulars of such claim must be stated.' Section 1498 of the Code, which is the same as section 134 of the old probate act, provides that when a claim is rejected, the holder must bring suit in the proper court 'within three months after the date of its rejection, if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due; otherwise the claim shall be forever barred.' In Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 25, it was held that a mortgage lien was not a 'claim against the estate' of a deceased person, within the meaning of the probate act, which must be presented within the period prescribed by the notice to creditors or be barred; and in support of this it was said, (arguendo:) 'Whatever signification, then, may be attached to the term "claims," standing by itself, it is evident that in the probate act it only had reference to such debts or demands against the decedent as might have been enforced against him in his lifetime by personal actions for the recovery of money, and upon which only a money judgment could have been rendered. In this sense a mortgage lien is not a claim against the estate.' One of the reasons assigned for this construction of the probate act was that a contingent claim (assuming a mortgage lien to be such) could not be supported by the affidavit required by section 131 of that act, since a contingent claim could not become due, nor could the amount thereof be known before the contingency happened. But, as we have seen, this obstacle has been removed by section 1494 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The decision in Fallon v. Butler, however, is rested principally upon the ground that only those 'claims' upon which a personal money judgment may be rendered are required to be presented for allowance, without regard to whether they are 'due, not due, or contingent.' The mortgage in question in that case was overdue, and might have been enforced two years before the death of the mortgagor; but it was said that an action for the enforcement of the mortgage was distinct from an action to recover a money judgment on the note secured by the mortgage. It was not decided in that case that it was unnecessary to present for allowance an immature contingent claim upon which a money judgment might be rendered after it should become due. It was said, however, that the term 'claims' only referred to those demands upon which a money judgment might have been rendered against the decedent in his lifetime. Literally understood, perhaps, this would exclude from the meaning of the word 'claims' all demands of every kind, which did not fall due until after the death of the decedent, even though a money judgment might be rendered upon them after they should become due; and it would follow that claims upon promissory notes and other contracts for the direct payment of money, not due until after the death of the testator, need not be presented to the executor for allowance. It will hardly be contended that this was the intention of the learned justice who wrote the opinion in that case. Near the close of the opinion, however, the intention of the court is expressed more precisely, as follows: 'In the use of the term "claims" it [the legislature] intended to embrace only such demands or liabilities as might by action be reduced to simple money judgments, and to leave the enforcement of specific liens and equitable rights to the ordinary proceedings in the district courts.' This expresses all that could have been intended as to the meaning of the word 'claims.' Whether the claims were due, not due, or contingent must have been considered immaterial to the decision. Moreover, the decision, such as it was, and particularly as to the construction of the word 'claims,' was doubted and limited to the exact facts of that case in Ellis v. Polhemus, 27 Cal. 350, wherein Mr. Chief Justice SANDERSON, among other things, said: 'The meaning of the word "claim" is broad enough to embrace a mortgage or any other lien, and in the 186th section of the [probate] act mortgages and other liens are expressly mentioned as valid claims against the estate; * * * but if there was any doubt upon that point it would seem to be removed by the language of the 133d section, which provides that, "if the claim be founded on a bond, bill, note, or other instrument, the original shall be presented," etc.' The definition of the word 'claims,' given in Fallon v. Butler, was cited in Estate of McCausland, 52 Cal. 577, to the point that a proceeding for a family allowance by the widow is not an action or proceeding against an executor or administrator. Again, in Estate of Swain, 67 Cal. 641, 8 Pac. Rep. 497, the same definition is cited to the point that a balance struck upon an account may be presented as a claim against an estate, since an action might have been maintained upon it against Swain in his lifetime. Again, in Stuttmeister v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 489, 14 Pac. Rep. 35, the case of Fallon v. Butler was cited in support of the proposition 'that the term "claim," as used in the Code in reference to estates of deceased persons, has reference to such demands or debts against the decedent as existed, and (if due) might have been enforced against him in his lifetime by proper action.' These are the only cases cited by counsel as affirming the case of Fallon v. Butler; yet none of them touch the point, even, that no claim need be presented except such as may be reduced to a money judgment, and certainly afford no support to the construction of the opinion contended for by counsel for appellants, to the effect that immature contingent claims upon which, when due, a money judgment may be rendered, are not required to be presented to the administrator for allowance, and are not barred if not presented. To this extent, however, the law must be found to go to maintain the action at bar; for, although the claim upon which it was brought is a contingent claim which did not become due or absolute until after the expiration of the period prescribed by the notice to creditors, it is nevertheless a claim upon which a money judgment may be rendered, and upon which such a judgment might have been rendered against Blythe in his lifetime, had it become due before his death. The decision in Fallon v. Butler, limited, as it has been, to actions to enforce mortgage liens, in which no money judgment is sought, was affirmed, however, by the legislature in 1876, and made an exception to section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it theretofore stood, which, considered in connection with other sections of the Code above quoted, seems very significant of the intention of the legislature to allow no other exception to the rule that 'no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator.' And this exception was probably enacted in deference to the decision in Fallon v. Butler as limited in Ellis v. Polhemus.

"Counsel for appellants contend that the term 'contingent claim,' as used in section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 'must be confined to existing claims, and cannot be extended to mere possibilities.' There seems to be very little room for controversy as to the meaning of the adjective 'contingent' or the noun 'contingency.' Webster defines the noun as follows: '(1) The quality of being contingent or casual; the possibility of coming to pass. (2) An event which may occur; a possibility; a casualty.' And defines the adjective 'contingent' as follows: '(1) Possible, or liable, but not certain to occur; incidental; casual. (2) Dependent on that which is undetermined or unknown. (3) (Law.) Dependent for effect on something that may or may not occur.' The law dictionaries and the Century Dictionary give substantially the same definitions. Among those given in the Century Dictionary are the following: 'Not existing or occurring through necessity; dependent upon a foreseen possibility; provisionally liable to exist, happen, or take effect in the future.' Indeed, the word 'possibility' is defined (in law) to be 'a contingency.' See Webster, Bouvier, Burrill, and Anderson. All anticipated future events which are not certain to occur are contingent events, and may properly be denominated 'mere possibilities,' more or less remote, while anticipated events which are certain to occur, or must necessarily occur, are in no degree contingent.

"Section 1493, Code Civil Proc., distinguishes three classes of claims against an estate which must be presented: (1) Claims due; (2) claims not due; and (3) contingent claims. This implies that the mere fact that a claim is not due does not make it contingent. If the amount of the claim and the date at which it is to become due are certain, it is not contingent, though not due. Therefore a contingent claim is not distinguished from other claims by the qualifying words 'not due,' but by the words 'not absolute,' as in sections 1648, 1650, Id. A claim ceases to be contingent when it becomes absolute, though not yet due, as in the case of a contract to pay money six months after the future occurrence of a contingent event, in which the obligation becomes absolute six months before due; yet a contingent claim may become absolute and due at the same time.

"It is further contended for appellants that they had no existing claim against Blythe's estate which could have been presented during the period of ten months after publication of notice to creditors, since Blythe's liability to indemnify them did not become absolute or due until the contingency happened, two years after that period had expired. It is true that their claim was neither absolute nor due during that period, but it was nevertheless an existing valuable claim against the estate of Blythe, assignable, devisable, and descendible, (Kenyon v. See, 94 N. Y. 563,) and also detrimental to Blythe's estate. It consisted of a then-existing obligation arising from an express covenant of the decedent to indemnify the appellants for one half of all damages they might suffer from water, etc., during the term of the lease. It was substantially a covenant of insurance. Counsel ask, what would have been the effect of an allowance of this claim by the administrator? A sufficient answer to this is that an allowance of the claim would have admitted and established the validity of the obligation, and would have entitled it 'to be filed in court and ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration,' (section 1497,) 'as the circumstances of the estate required,' (section 1647.) If still contingent at the time of the settlement of accounts, 'the amount thereof, or such part of the same as the holder would be entitled to if the claim were due, established, or absolute, must be paid into the court, and there remain, to be paid over to the party when he becomes entitled thereto.' Sections 1648, 1650, 1651. It is assumed by counsel for appellants that before the contingency happens the obligation is not a debt; and thence they conclude that it could not have been 'ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate.' Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that a contingent claim is not a technical legal debt, it does not follow that it may not be ranked 'among' debts. The first two examples given by Mr. Webster, of authorized uses of the verb 'to rank,' are as follows: 'Poets were "ranked" in the class of philosophers.' 'Heresy is "ranked" with idolatry and witchcraft.' The first does not necessarily mean nor imply that poets are philosophers, nor the second that heresy is idolatry or witchcraft. Nor does the requirement that an allowed claim shall be ranked 'among' debts exclude from the ranks all claims which may not properly be termed 'legal' debts. The statute plainly requires contingent claims to be presented for allowance, and that all allowed claims shall be filed in court, and ranked 'among' the acknowledged (allowed) debts, whether all such allowed claims are technical debts or not. Section 130 of the probate act, and section 1493 of the Code as first enacted, provided that, 'if a claim is not presented within the time limited in the notice, it is barred forever, except if it be not then due, or if it be contingent, it may be presented within ten months after it becomes due or absolute.' By the amendment of section 1493 of the Code, in 1880, this exception was omitted. This omission clearly shows it to have been the intention of the legislature, not only that contingent claims should be presented within the prescribed period, but that if not presented within that period they should be barred forever.

"Appellants' counsel finally insist that the term 'contingent claim,' as employed in section 1493, Code Civil Proc., cannot be so extended as to include a claim whose amount is contingent, and, as authority for this, refer to certain bankruptcy cases claimed to be analogous, most of which arose under the United States bankrupt act of 1841, (5 St. at Large, 444,) the fourth section of which provided that the judgment or certificate of discharge of the bankrupt shall 'be deemed a full and complete discharge of all debts, contracts, and other engagements of such bankrupt which are provable under this act.' The fifth section provides for proving all kinds of contingent claims which may become absolute in the future, and that when they become absolute the present value thereof shall be ascertained 'under the direction of the court,' and allowed accordingly, 'as debts in præsenti.' In the cases cited, it was held that those claims whose amounts were contingent and uncertain were not provable under the act, and consequently that the bankrupt was not discharged from his obligation thereon. But even upon this point the bankrupt cases are conflicting. See Jemison v. Blowers, 5 Barb. 692, and Heywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law, 104. I think the analogy of the bankrupt cases to the case at bar too remote to entitle the former to much, if any, weight as authorities in the latter, upon the point here under consideration. The principal object of the bankrupt act was to discharge insolvent living debtors from a part (not all) of their just debts and obligations, as a matter of grace; whereas, the probate laws of this state propose to enforce payment of all just debts of deceased debtors, as matter of strict justice. The question decided in the bankrupt cases cited related to the construction of the bankrupt act of 1841, namely, were contingent debts, the amounts of which could not be ascertained in the course of the proceedings, provable and dischargeable under that act? No such question is involved in this case. There is no doubt that all just contingent claims arising from contracts of a deceased person are provable against his estate at some time during the administration thereof, and must be paid or in some mode secured in the course of administration. The sole question in this case is one of construction of the probate law of this state, namely, does the probate law of this state require that all contingent claims, which are provable and payable at any time, shall be presented for allowance within ten months after publication of notice to creditors, as a condition precedent to the commencement of actions thereon? A true answer to this question depends upon peculiar provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure, nothing analogous to which is to be found in the bankrupt act of 1841. Besides, no question analogous to this was decided in any of the bankrupt cases cited.

"Counsel for appellants have suggested difficulties in the way of providing for the payment or security of that class of contingent claims, the amounts of which cannot be ascertained within the ordinary period of administration. Such difficulties have always been encountered, but generally, if not always, overcome. See 2 Williams, Ex'rs, (6th Amer. Ed.) top pages 1447–1453. Where the limited jurisdiction of a distinct probate court has proved to be inadequate, the original jurisdiction of courts of equity over the administration of estates has been invoked. Our superior courts have both probate and equity jurisdiction, so that whenever, in the course of the administration and settlement of estates, our probate statutes are found to be inadequate to authorize and accomplish all that a court of equity is authorized to do in such cases, our superior courts may exercise their equity powers in connection with, and as incidental to, their powers in probate matters, to the extent necessary to a complete administration and distribution of estates: provided, of course, that nothing be done in contravention of any statutory provision. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1153. As to the means and mode of procedure by which the payment or security of contingent demands is to be enforced, no question is involved in this case, except the question as to the necessity of their presentation for allowance within ten months after publication of notice to creditors. It is not denied that all just contingent claims arising from contracts should be paid or provided for in the course of administration, if our statutes have provided the requisite means and mode of procedure; and what has been said under this head is only intended to show that in this class of cases courts of equity have always had and exercised the power to protect and enforce contingent claims against the estates of deceased persons, and for this purpose have supplied the necessary means and modes of procedure, so far as not inconsistent with any statute; and that, since our superior courts have all the powers of courts of equity, they may do likewise.

"In conclusion, it may be remarked that if contingent claims are not to be entirely ignored in the administration of estates, it is quite as important that they should be presented for allowance as that absolute claims should be presented. Otherwise, how is any provision whatever to be made for them before the estate is settled? Timely notice of all claims which may prejudicially affect an estate should be given to the administrator, so that he may have an opportunity to investigate their merits, and to contest them, if advisable, before the evidence of their invalidity shall be lost. That they should be forever barred if not presented within the time prescribed by law is surely no greater hardship than that absolute claims should be so barred. I think the judgment should be affirmed. Vanclief, C.

McCROSKEY v. LADD et al. (No. 13,297.)

Vendor and Purchaser — Rescission of Contract — Liability of Purchaser on First Installment.

1. Plaintiff agreed to sell land to defendants, a certain amount to be paid on the execution of the contract, and the balance within 60 days, when plaintiff was to make a deed. If defendants failed to make "said payments as herein named, they shall forfeit all right to said property, and all right to all payments made herein. If said title is not sufficient and good, then said money paid shall be refunded." On the execution of the contract, defendants gave their note for the first payment, payable one day after date, and, being dissatisfied with the title, afterwards repudiated the purchase. After 60 days plaintiff sued on the note. Held that, by not suing on the note until after the entire purchase price became due, plaintiff waived his right to recover thereon as an obligation independent of the deferred payment, and can only recover by showing that he has complied with his contract.

2. Where several persons agree jointly to purchase land, a tender of deed to one of them is insufficient to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, without proof that all of such persons were named therein as grantees.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; James F. Breen, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by one McCroskey against Ladd and others. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Hudner and M. T. Dooling, for appellant. N. C. Briggs, for respondents.

Harrison, J. The plaintiff made an agreement in writing with the defendants and two others on the 25th of August, 1887, to sell and convey to them certain real estate in Hollister for the sum of $6,500, of which $650 was to be paid at that date, and the balance within 60 days thereafter. The agreement also contained the following clause: "And said McCroskey, upon receiving said payments, agrees to make a deed of said property to said persons, and convey title to said premises to them, and, if said persons fail to make said payments as herein named, they shall forfeit all right to said property, and all right to all payments made herein. If said title is not sufficient and good, then said money paid shall be refunded." Instead of paying the $650 in money upon that day, the defendants, for themselves and their associates, executed to the plaintiff their promissory note for $650, payable one day after date. After the execution of the agreement the parties thereto had some negotiations regarding the examination of the title to the property, which resulted in the vendees being dissatisfied therewith, and a demand by the defendants that the plaintiff surrender to them their note. This the plaintiff refused, but tendered a deed of the property to McClay, one of the vendees, and demanded payment of him of the full amount of the purchase money, viz., $6,500, but McClay refused either to accept the deed or pay the money. In November, 1888, the plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover from them the amount of the promissory note. The complaint is in the ordinary form of a complaint upon a promissory note. The defendants in their answer set up the transaction of which the note was a part, and pleaded a failure of consideration. The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom, bringing the case here upon the judgment roll alone.

The action upon the note, being between the original parties thereto, is subject to an inquiry into its consideration, and is also subject to any equities existing between the parties which arise out of the execution of the note, or are connected therewith. The note was given for a portion of the purchase price of a tract of land to be thereafter conveyed by the plaintiff under his agreement with the defendants and their associates, was executed in pursuance of said agreement at the same time with the execution of the agreement, was a part of the same transaction, and is to be interpreted and regarded as a part of the agreement made between the parties at that date. The finding of the court that it was executed "in pursuance of said agreement, in the place and stead of the payment of $650" provided for in the written instrument, must be construed as a contemporaneous agreement between the parties to substitute the note for the provision in the instrument that the sum of money should be paid at the date of its execution. The execution of a promissory note for the payment of a portion of the purchase money did not render the relative obligations of the parties to the agreement of sale any different from what they would have been had this obligation been incorporated into the written agreement itself. The obligation of the purchaser under such an agreement is the same, whether the purchase money is made payable in installments by the terms of the agreement itself, or whether it is evidenced by a counter obligation on his part, or by promissory notes executed by him as a part of the same transaction. All of the writings that are executed at that time become a part of the transaction, and are to be considered together as parts of one agreement. Culver v. Burgher, 21 Barb. 324; Divine v. Divine, 58 Barb. 264; Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 29 Pac. Rep. 508.

The respective obligations of the parties to an agreement for the conveyance of land when the purchase money is made payable in installments are to be construed as independent obligations, or as dependent and concurrent, according to the terms in which the agreement is expressed. If an installment is made payable prior to the date at which the conveyance is to be made, the obligation to pay the installment and to make the conveyance will be regarded as independent obligations, and the seller can maintain an action for the recovery of the installment without the execution or tender of a conveyance; whereas, if the payment of the installment is to be made upon the execution of the conveyance, no recovery thereof can be had, except upon the averment and proof of such execution, or of a tender thereof. If the agreement is silent upon this point, the obligations will be regarded as mutual and dependent, so that neither party can have a right of action against the other without a previous performance, or offer to perform, on his part; and, if the time for the performance of the conditions on both sides has expired, it is incumbent on either party, before he can enforce a performance by the other, to do or offer to do all that by the agreement he is required to do. If a recovery of the installment is not sought until after the time for the payment of the last installment, the plaintiff must aver and prove the same facts as would be required in an action to recover the last installment. Johnson v. Wygant, 11 Wend. 48. If he defers the collection of the several installments until the time for the collection of them all has accrued, he has no right of action upon any of the prior installments separate from that upon them all. His cause of action is not upon the agreement to pay the installments, but for the consideration upon which he agreed to convey the land, and is an entire and single demand. He has no right of action upon a part thereof distinct from that upon the whole, and in any action brought by him for a part or for the whole of the purchase money, after all of the payments have become due, he must aver and prove that before he commenced the action he had complied with the agreement on his part, or had offered so to comply, by making or tendering a conveyance of the premises. The obligations to make these payments, which were originally independent, have by his waiver of the right to enforce them become dependent and concurrent with his own obligation to convey, and can be enforced only upon his showing that he is not in default. As in the case of any other obligation which is entire, but by its terms is to be performed at stated intervals prior to the time for its complete performance, whether it be for the payment of money or for the delivery of merchandise, if the holder of such obligation delays its enforcement until after the time for its complete performance, his right of action for the several installments will have become merged in the entire obligation, and can be enforced only in a single action upon that obligation. These are elementary principles in the construction of contracts, and their application to cases involving facts like those under consideration is fully sustained by Beecher v. Conradt, 13 N. Y. 108; Eddy v. Davis, 116 N. Y. 247, 22 N. E. Rep. 362; Hoag v. Parr, 13 Hun, 95; Smith v. McCluskey, 45 Barb. 610; Williams v. Healey, 3 Denio, 366; Thomson v. Smith, 63 N. Y. 304. In Beecher v. Conradt, supra, the agreement of sale provided for the payment of the purchase money in five annual installments, and after the maturity of the last installment the plaintiff brought an action to recover the entire purchase price, without having made a tender of a conveyance before the commencement of his action, and, in holding that the action could not be maintained, the court said: "The plaintiff, having elected to wait until the fifth and last installment became due, and upon the payment of which the defendant would be entitled to a deed, cannot now sustain his action for either installment without proof of performance, or readiness to perform, on his part. The covenants as to the first four installments were originally independent, but the plaintiff, by his omission to insist upon a strict performance by the defendant, has lost the right to bring more than one suit for the money which formed the consideration for his conveyance. The parties by a lapse of time are in the same situation as though the purchase money was all payable at one time. The defendant has lost his right to pay the installments separately, and the plaintiff his right to enforce collection by separate suits. There is but a single cause of action, one and indivisible. The defendant, if he would obtain his deed, must pay all, and the plaintiff, if he would recover, must show such a performance on his part as would entitle him to all the unpaid consideration. The condition attaches to the whole debt and to every part of it." In the present case the plaintiff could have brought his action on the note at its maturity, and the obligation of the defendants would then have been construed as an independent agreement, and their liability determined solely by the terms of the note. But by deferring his action until after the time when the entire purchase money had matured, he has waived the right to treat this note as an independent obligation. That has become merged in the obligation to pay the whole of the consideration, and must be construed with reference to the terms of that obligation. In an action against the purchasers for the whole purchase money, they are entitled, as the consideration thereof, to a conveyance of the premises, and they cannot be compelled to pay a portion of the consideration for which they are to receive the conveyance, except upon receiving the entire consideration for their obligation. As a recovery by the plaintiff in this action would be a bar to any other action by him for the remainder of the purchase money, the defendants have the same right to a conveyance of the premises that they would have if the action was for the whole purchase price. It is neither alleged in the complaint nor found by the court that the plaintiff made any tender of a conveyance to the defendants, or either of them, and, as the judgment was in favor of the defendants, it was incumbent upon the appellant to cause it to appear by the record that at the time of commencing his action he had so complied with all the terms of his agreement as to place the defendants in default. The court does not find to whom the deed which the plaintiff tendered to McClay purported to convey the land, and, as the judgment must be presumed to be correct, we must assume that it was a conveyance in favor of McClay alone, and did not purport to convey the land to the defendants herein. The judgment is affirmed.

CHURCHILL v. PACIFIC IMP. CO. (No. 14,437.)

Limitation of Actions—Liability of Innkeepers—General Demurrer.

1. Civil Code, § 1859, provides that an innkeeper is liable for all losses of personal property placed by guests under his care, unless occasioned by an irresistible, superhuman cause, by a public enemy, by the negligence of the owner, or by the act of some one whom he brought into the inn. Held, that this is the liability created by common law, and therefore, in view of Civil Code, § 5, which provides that the sections of the Code, so far as they are substantially the same as the common law, must be construed as a continuation thereof, and not as new enactments, an action based on such liability is not governed by Code Civil Proc. § 338, providing that an action on a liability created by statute must be commenced within three years, but by section 339, which provides that an action on an obligation, not founded on an instrument of writing, must be brought within two years.

2. The word "construed," as used in section 5, means "regarded" or "considered," not "interpreted," "explained," or "translated."

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 431, providing that a demurrer may be taken to the whole complaint or to any of the causes of action stated therein, a general demurrer may be taken to a complaint, though it contains two separate counts.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Churchill against the Pacific Improvement Company to recover the value of personal property lost by plaintiff through the burning down of defendant's public inn, at which plaintiff was a guest. From a judgment for defendant, entered on an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. Frank Shay, for respondent.

Paterson, J. A judgment in favor of defendant on demurrer to the complaint was entered in the court below, and plaintiff has appealed therefrom. The question is whether the cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by the statute of limitations. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant is engaged in the business of keeping a public inn; that on April 1, 1887, the plaintiff and his wife were guests in said inn, and plaintiff had taken there with him as such guest, and placed under the care of the defendant as innkeeper, certain described personal property belonging to him of the value of $3,492; that on the night of said 1st day of April the inn and plaintiff's said property were, through the negligence of the defendant, destroyed by fire. Another and separate cause of action is set forth in the complaint, but it is the same as the first, except in two particulars, namely: It is alleged that a portion of the property, valued at $3,040, was the personal effects of the plaintiff's wife, and that, before the commencement of the action, she assigned to the plaintiff all claim for damages against the defendant. The complaint was filed March 5, 1890. The defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that "it clearly and affirmatively appears upon the face of said complaint that the cause of action therein set forth is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure." This section provides that an action upon an obligation, not founded upon an instrument of writing, may be brought within two years. We think that the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint was correct. Section 1859, Civil Code, provides that "an innkeeper is liable for all losses of or injuries to personal property placed by his guests under his care, unless occasioned by an irresistible, superhuman cause, by a public enemy, by the negligence of the owner, or by the act of some one whom he brought into the inn." Appellant contends that the liability established by this section is one created by statute, and that the time within which an action can be commenced upon such a liability is governed by subdivision 1 of section 338, Code Civil Proc., which provides that "an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture," must be commenced within three years. We do not agree with the appellant in this contention. The rule stated in section 1859 is simply declaratory of the common law, and section 5 of the Civil Code provides that the sections of the Code, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes or the common law, must be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments. In Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 600, the court said: "But the preponderating weight of authority, from the time of the decision in Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32, to the present time, is in favor of the rule that he [the innkeeper] is liable as an insurer." In Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172, the court said: "His liability extends to wearing apparel, jewelry, money, and even to the horses, wheat, butter, and other articles of bulk belonging to the guest, if received by the innkeeper into his care, and within his place of entertainment. This is the rule of the common law, enforced in the days of Lord Coke, and long prior, and ever since, as well in England as in this state. * * * The liability of an innkeeper for the goods of his guests has been settled for centuries. The act of 1855 does not purport to create it, nor even to declare it. It assumes the liability." If, therefore, there were no such statutory provision as we find in section 1859, the liability of the innkeeper would be the same as it is under that section.

Appellant's contention that the word "construed," as used in section 5, means simply to "interpret," to "explain," to "translate," or "to show the meaning of," cannot be sustained. As there used, the legislature clearly intended it to mean "regarded," or "considered." It certainly was not intended to say that the provisions of the Code, so far as they are substantially the same as the common law, should be construed the same as the common law. There is no such thing as construction of the common law. We do not interpret it; we declare it; we say what it is. Section 20 of the Civil Code adds no strength to the appellant's position.

It is claimed that the demurrer ought to have been overruled, because it is general in terms, and there are two separate and distinct causes of action stated in the complaint; that it is impossible, therefore, from the demurrer, to ascertain which of the counts is demurred to. In this contention, also, we think the appellant is in error. The demurrer is to the whole complaint. Section 431, Code Civil Proc., provides that the demurrer "may be taken to the whole complaint, or to any of the causes of action stated therein." There are two counts in the complaint, it is true, but neither of them is good. The authorities cited by the appellant, therefore, are not in point.

The judgment is affirmed.

TREWATHA v. BUCHANAN GOLD MINING & MILLING CO. (No. 14,366.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1892.)

NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Defendant's employes were raised and lowered in its mine by means of a hoisting tackle, which was also used to hoist the debris from the mine. Plaintiff, about to get into the bucket, gave, as he claimed, the proper signal to the engineer for hoisting a man. The bucket was at first raised slowly, and then at a great speed, and was not stopped at the proper time, but was hurled against the sheave with such force that plaintiff was injured. The engineer testified that he heard the signal for raising rock, but knew there was something lighter than rock in the bucket, and could not explain why he had not stopped the engine at the proper time. He had run engines for several years, and there was no proof of carelessness on his part prior to the accident in question. Held, that the accident was due to the negligence of the engineer, and defendant was not liable therefor, under Civil Code, § 1970, providing that an employer is not liable to his employe for the negligence of a fellow servant, unless he neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the fellow servant.

2. A charge that if the bell and appliances used to signal the engineer were out of order, and defendant or its superintendent knew, or had the means of knowing, such fact, and plaintiff did not know, and did not have, equally with defendant, the means of knowing, this, and if plaintiff gave the proper signal, and the engineer, on account of the defect in the bell and other appliances, did not hear such signal, and for this reason hoisted plaintiff from the mine at such dangerous speed as to result in the accident in which plaintiff was injured, then the jury must find for plaintiff, is erroneous, because ignoring the rule of law that, where the proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of a fellow servant, no recovery can be had.

BAUM v. REAY. (No. 14,028.)

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE OF POSSESSION—REFRESHING MEMORY OF WITNESSES.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 318, provides that no action for the recovery of real property can be maintained unless plaintiff, his ancestor or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property within five years before suit. In ejectment for an unimproved lot, the evidence showed that plaintiff and his grantors had held the legal title to the same for more than ten years prior to the action, maintaining the fence inclosing it, and paying the taxes. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff.

2. A witness may be permitted to refresh his memory from a writing or memorandum made by himself at the occurrence of the facts to which it relates, but the memorandum is not competent evidence to prove the facts stated, in itself.

3. In ejectment, evidence that plaintiff and his grantor paid the taxes on the land in suit is admissible to show the claim of title, and that it had not been abandoned.

PIEPER v. PEERS et al. (No. 14,523.)[1]

LIABILITY ON APPEAL BOND—DEMAND.

An action cannot be maintained on an appeal bond given to stay a judgment for the delivery of certain hay, or for $299, the value thereof, the bond being conditioned, under Code Civil Proc. § 978, to pay the judgment if the appeal be dismissed, unless it is shown that an execution has been issued since the dismissal of the appeal, or a demand for the property made, or that a delivery thereof cannot be had, since it was necessary that this should appear before the money judgment could be payable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Pieper against Alexander Peers and Peter Grimley to recover on a bond given to stay an execution pending appeal, on which bond defendants became sureties. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. H. Campbell, for appellants. W. P. Venor, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll. Plaintiff's assignor, Marie Albert, obtained a judgment in a justice's court against one Juan Lucas for the delivery of certain hay, or for $299, the value thereof, if delivery could not be had. Lucas appealed to the superior court, and gave a stay bond on which the defendants herein were sureties. The bond was conditioned, as required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "that the said appellant will pay the amount of the judgment appealed from, and all costs, and will obey the order of the court made therein, if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed," etc. The appeal was dismissed by the appellant therein. It is not alleged or found that any execution had been issued, or that since the dismissal of the appeal a demand for the property had been made upon the defendant, or that a delivery thereof could not be had, but simply "that no part of said hay has been delivered pursuant to said judgment, or any part of the judgment for its value, or any part of said costs been paid." The objection is now made that it is not alleged or found that a delivery of the property could not be had, or that any order was made by the superior court which was disobeyed by the appellant in that case; therefore there was no money judgment which the principal was bound to pay, or in fact could have paid. I see no answer to this objection. The judgment was for the delivery of hay. The alternate money judgment was enforceable only in case the property could not be recovered. Until that fact was determined, the money judgment, as an operative, enforceable judgment, did not exist. The defendant in the judgment could not secure the privilege of paying the money judgment, rather than deliver the property, by simply taking an appeal. Although, therefore, the undertaking is absolute that the sureties are bound for the payment of the amount of the judgment, it cannot be understood that they undertook that their principal would do something which it was not only not his duty to do, but which he could not have done, unless with the consent of the owner of the judgment. It means that the sureties are bound for the payment of the judgment whenever it becomes payable, when not to pay it would be a failure to perform his obligation on the part of the principal. Whether it would be necessary to have an execution and a return made to the effect that a return of the property cannot be had, is a different question. It should at least be alleged that a return of the property could not be had. I think, therefore, that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered. It is further ordered that the court below grant the parties a reasonable time within which to amend their pleadings.

In re TILLMAN'S ESTATE. (No. 15,016.)

Appeal of PENEBSKY.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1892.)

WILLS—CONTEST—GROUNDS OF—CONVEYANCE OF PROPERTY.

Since Civil Code, § 1292, provides that a written will can only be revoked by a writing or by its destruction, a contest interposed to a petition for the probate of a will, which alleged that the property therein disposed of was, after the execution of the will, conveyed to contestant, presents no ground for contest, where it does not also allege that such conveyance declared the will revoked.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

To the petition of George W. Wright for the probate of the will of M. E. Tillman, deceased, A. T. Penebsky filed a contest; and from an order sustaining a demurrer to the contest, and admitting the will to probate, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. W. A. Plunkett, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. George W. Wright filed a petition for the probate of the will of the decedent. A. T. Penebsky, the sole heir at law of the testatrix, filed a contest, to which the petitioner demurred. The demurrer was sustained, and the will was probated. This appeal is from the order sustaining the demurrer, and from the judgment admitting the will to probate. The property stated in the petition to have been left by decedent consisted of several parcels of real estate, household property of the value of $50, and $800 cash on deposit in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. The will of decedent was dated and made February 13, 1891, and a codicil thereto was made August 3, 1891. The sole ground of contest is that said will and codicil were revoked on the 7th day of August, 1891, and that such revocation was made by a deed executed and delivered by the testatrix on that day to contestant, conveying to him all the real estate mentioned in the will, and by the assignment to him of the bank book of said deposit, and that conveyance and assignment were absolute and unconditional, and with the intent and purpose of revoking said will, and that the testatrix intended thereby to convey to contestant all her property, both real and personal. The demurrer was properly sustained. The validity of a will is not affected by the subsequent conveyance of property named in and specifically devised thereby, nor is such conveyance affected by the mere fact that a will had been previously executed, disposing of the same property. As a will does not take effect until the death of the party making it, the effect of a subsequent valid conveyance can only be to take the property conveyed out of the operation of the will, leaving it entirely unaffected as to property not conveyed. If the testatrix was not seised or possessed of any property at the time of her death, there could be no object or purpose in proving her will; but even in such case the contestant could not be affected by such proceeding. Here the will, executed shortly before the death of the testatrix, showed a large amount of real estate and some personal property. The contestant raises no question except as to a subsequent disposition of that property. Suppose that such conveyance had been obtained by fraud or duress sufficient to render it void, and that question had been raised by the petitioner in response to the grounds of contest, the court in that proceeding could not have tried the issue, not only because it was foreign to the proceeding before the court, but because there was no one to appear for and defend the estate; nor would a finding and judgment against the contestant that the deed under which he claims is void have bound or concluded him, as the court had no authority in this proceeding to determine that question. Corker v. Corker, 87 Cal. 643, 25 Pac. Rep. 922. Section 1292 of the Civil Code provides: "Except in the cases in this chapter mentioned, no writen will nor any part thereof can be revoked or altered otherwise than (1) by a written will, or other writing of the testator, declaring such revocation or alteration, and executed with the same formalities with which a will should be executed by such testator; (2) by tearing, destroying, etc., with intent to revoke."

It is not alleged that the deed executed and delivered to the contestant "declared" a revocation of the will, nor is it alleged that it was executed with the formalities with which a will is required to be executed, and therefore it could not be a revocation of the will; it could only take out of the operation of the will the property conveyed, as a will can only operate upon so much of the property as legally and equitably belonged to the testartix at the time of her death. Bruck v. Tucker, 32 Cal. 426. The assignment of the bank account, as alleged, was insufficient to transfer the household furniture, and it is not alleged that the furniture was a gift to him causa mortis or otherwise. Evidence offered to be given by contestant in support of his grounds of contest was properly excluded. If the court erred in either ruling, it could not prejudice appellant, as the probate of the will could not affect his rights under the deed or assignment. Whether the property passed under the deed or under the will is a question that must be determined in some other proceeding. I advise that the judgment and orders appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. WILSHIRE v. NEWMAN.

(No. 14,071.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—FIRE DEPARTMENT—REGULATION BY ORDINANCE.

Const. art. 11, § 11, which provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws," does not authorize the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, by ordinance, to reorganize and regulate the fire department of that municipality, since Act March 28, 1878, (charter of the city and county,) provides for the organization and administration of such department as a branch of the municipal government, and cannot be abrogated by such ordinance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action in the name of the people on relation of W. B. Wilshire against one Newman to try title to the office of member of the board of fire commissioners. Defendant had judgment, and relator appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Johnson, Ex Atty. Gen., and Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. Garber, Bishop & Boalt, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action in the nature of quo warranto, under section 803 et seq., Code Civil Proc., to determine whether the relator or the defendant is entitled to the office of member of the board of fire commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco. The various acts of the legislature relating to the board of fire commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, and the effect thereof, are considered in People v. Edwards, 93 Cal. 153, 28 Pac. Rep. 831, and the cases therein referred to. The relator herein relies upon an ordinance, which is fully set out in the complaint, providing for the complete reorganization of the fire department and the appointment of a board of fire commissioners. His title to the office depends upon the validity of that ordinance. On the 16th of March, 1889, the ordinance in question, popularly known as the "Barry Ordinance," was passed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, establishing and regulating the fire department, and providing for a commission, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the board of supervisors. On April 8, 1889, the board appointed the relator and Charles H. Haswell, H. R. Mann, P. F. Dunne, and Maurice Schmitt members of the board, to have the control and management of the fire department. The court below held, and properly, we think, that the board of supervisors had no authority to pass said ordinance. Section 11, art. 11, of the constitution, provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." But this delegation of power to make police regulations is authority to make only such regulations as are usual and necessary in the government of municipalities under their respective charters. The act of March 28, 1878, providing, as it does, for the organization and administration of one of the departments of the municipal government, is a part of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, and cannot be abrogated by any mere police regulation. Under it the fire department is a branch of the municipal government. Whitney v. Board, 14 Cal. 497. In People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 654, 6 Pac. Rep. 741, it was held that the act of April 1, 1878, relating to the police department, being a part of the charter, was continued in force by the constitution. The act under consideration there holds the same relation to the consolidation act as the statute we are now considering. The provision of the constitution referred to never was intended to clothe the board of supervisors with the power to annul a constituent part of the charter itself, or to overthrow one of the municipal departments. The power conferred by it is not vested in any particular branch of the municipal government, but in the whole municipality. The government of the city and county of San Francisco is distributed into different departments. The board of supervisors represents one of these departments. The board of fire commissioners represents another department. The board of supervisors has no more authority to reorganize the board of fire commissioners than the latter has to reorganize the board of supervisors. The same power that established one board established the other, and one is just as essential and important a part of the municipal government as the other. The regulations provided for by section 11, art. 11, are such as are in accordance with the fundamental or organic law. This must be so; otherwise the board of supervisors could completely revolutionize the entire city government under a grant of power to make "such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws,"—in effect make a new charter by ordinance, and change the same as often as it desired. The strongest argument against the validity of the act is that in repealing the provision declaring how and by whom two of the officers should be appointed the constitution necessarily destroyed these two offices; and inasmuch as the two were parts of an integral whole, and the provisions relating thereto being compensatory and inseparable, the destruction of the two effected the destruction of all. This contention was fully presented by eminent counsel in People v. Hammond, and a petition for rehearing was filed and denied. After such consideration and determination by the court, we think the point should be treated as finally settled. There is nothing in People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 115, 21 Pac. Rep. 423, inconsistent with what has been said above. In that case we held simply that, as the legislature had failed to fix the term of office of the members of the board of health, they held at the pleasure of the governor. In State v. Brewster, 44 Ohio St. 592, 9 N. E. Rep. 849, cited by respondent, it was admitted by all parties that upon the expiration of Brewster's term there was a vacancy in the office. Judgment affirmed.

SHERER v. SUPERIOR COURT. (No. 15,-231.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1892.)

CERTIORARI—REVIEW—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

Where a trial court, on motion regularly submitted by plaintiff, struck out defendant's answer, and rendered judgment against him as by default, the action of the court, though erroneous, was within its jurisdiction, and a writ of certiorari would not lie to annul the judgment. Paterson, J., dissenting.

Application by Sherer for a writ of certiorari to annul a judgment rendered against him in the superior court of Lassen county. Application denied.

Spencer & Raker, C. C. McClaskey, and Henry N. Clement, for petitioner. Shinn & Shinn, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an application for a writ of certiorari to annul a judgment entered by the superior court of Lassen county, in a certain action pending in that court on appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace of that county.

The application must be denied. The superior court committed a very grave error in striking out the answer of petitioner filed in that action, and in rendering judgment against him without any further trial, and as if he was in default. But the motion asking the court for such order and judgment was regularly submitted to it, and was clearly within its jurisdiction to decide; and, this being so, its judgment thereon cannot be annulled by means of the writ of certiorari. It must be deemed to be the settled law of this state that the writ of certiorari brings up for review but one question, and that is whether the inferior tribunal or court exceeded its jurisdiction. It cannot be used to correct errors of law or fact committed by the inferior tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction. Railroad Co. v. Placer Co., 46 Cal. 668; Buckley v. Superior Court, (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 8. Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, and does not depend upon the rightfulness of the decision made. The court in this case had the power, in the regular course of proceeding in the disposition of the case before it was actually called upon, to determine, as a matter of law, whether or not the answer of petitioner was properly filed, and whether he was legally in default in the action; and the fact that the court erred in such decision does not render its judgment void. Application for writ denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to agree with the majority in this case. When it appears upon the face of the record that judgment has been arbitrarily rendered in any case against a party, without a trial or hearing, as if he were in default, when he is not, the action of the court—it matters not what court it is—is in excess of its jurisdiction. In my opinion, its judgment is absolutely void, subject to collateral attack, and ought to be annulled on certiorari.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1892.)

QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING AND PROOF—FRAUD.

Evidence of fraud on the part of an administratrix in procuring the purchase of property for herself at probate sale is inadmissible, under the usual pleadings, in an action for quieting title, to overthrow the title acquired at such sale, when the fraud, or the facts constituting the fraud, have not been pleaded. Jones v. Hanna, 22 Pac. Rep. 883, 81 Cal. 507, distinguished.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Action by Jesse Burris against James Adams and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis H. Sharp and A. E. Bolton, for appellant. Hutchinson & Campbell and Donald Y. Campbell, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This is an action to quiet title to the undivided one eighth of certain land. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The affirmance of the judgment depends upon the correctness of certain rulings of the court below sustaining the validity of a certain probate sale, and sustaining objections to evidence offered by appellant for the purpose of showing the invalidity of certain conveyances made in pursuance of, and after, said sale. The land in contest originally belonged to the estate of James Kennedy, deceased, which was under process of administration during the years 1885, 1886, 1887. The defendant and respondent Mrs. E. A. K. McNeill was administratrix of said estate. On June 1, 1886, the superior court in which said administration was pending made an order in due form for the sale of certain real property of said estate for the payment of debts, expenses, etc.; and in pursuance thereof the administratrix, on December 2, 1886, sold to James Adams for $5,875 certain lands of said estate, including the land in contest in the present action. In pursuance of this sale, which was duly confirmed by the court, the administratrix on December 31, 1886, executed and delivered to said Adams a deed in form sufficient to convey to him all the title of said estate to the land in contest. In October, 1887, a final decree of distribution was duly entered in said estate, and the said Mrs. McNeill discharged as administratrix. The next year, on August 9, 1888, the said James Adams executed to said Mrs. McNeill a deed sufficient in form to convey all his title to the land described in the complaint. With respect to the title under which appellant claims, it is sufficient to say that one Annie Church (afterwards Annie Spaulding) had an interest in the said estate of James Kennedy, and was a distributee named in said decree of distribution made in said estate as aforesaid; and that afterwards, on November 4, 1889, she executed and delivered to appellant a deed sufficient in form to convey to appellant an interest in the land in contest, and which did so convey such interest if she, at the date of said deed, had any such interest. But as said deed was subsequent to the probate sale to Adams and his conveyance to Mrs. McNeill above mentioned, Mrs. Church had no interest in said land at the date of her said deed to appellant, unless the title of Mrs. McNeill, through said probate sale as aforesaid, can, for some reason, be overthrown.

1. Appellant contends that the probate sale was void because the petition for such sale was fatally defective. Many perplexing questions have arisen on collateral attacks on titles acquired through probate sales, but it is settled law here that in such cases a substantial compliance with statutory provisions on the subject are sufficient. Stuart v. Allen, 16 Cal. 501; Richardson v. Butler, 82 Cal. 176, 23 Pac. Rep. 9. And, in a doubtful case, a court will not lean towards the attacking party when he is, as in the case at bar, a mere volunteer, and when his grantor was a distributee in the final decree based upon the validity of the sale, and made no objection to it, and received without question the benefit of the money paid into the estate by the purchaser at the sale. The petition and the order of sale in the case at bar are quite lengthy, and contain many recitals; and we do not deem it necessary to set them forth here, or to notice in detail the objections made to them by appellant. It is enough to say that in our judgment the petition and the recitals of the order of sale (section 1537, Code Civil Proc.) clearly show a substantial and sufficient compliance with the Code, and that the objections of appellant go only to matters that are unimportant and immaterial. The court was fully informed of the facts showing the necessity of the sale.

2. Appellant offered evidence to show that Adams purchased the property at the probate sale at the instance and for the use and benefit of the respondent Mrs. McNeill, and that the deed afterwards made by Adams to said McNeill was in pursuance of a preconcerted arrangement between the two, by which he was to have the property. The court sustained an objection to the evidence upon the ground that there was no averment in the complaint under which such evidence was admissible. We think this ruling of the court was right. The complaint contains only the averments usually employed in an ordinary action to quiet title. Where the cause of action depends upon the proof of fraud, the facts constituting the fraud must be averred; and this rule has even been applied to defendants when the defense was of an affirmative nature. Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. Rep. 1045. In the case at bar appellant was the moving party. He bought, or had transferred to him, a lawsuit, and his only hope of winning it lay in the possibility of proving fraudulent acts which he did not aver. He knew from the start that the respondent McNeill had a perfect legal title which he could overthrow only by proving her guilty of a certain fraud, and he did not aver the fraud, even in general terms. She had a perfect right to purchase from Adams after she had ceased to be administratrix and the administration had been closed, and there was nothing on the face of the business that was irregular or improper. Appellant expected to succeed by proving the fraudulent violation of a trust, and he failed to aver either such violation, or the existence of the trust itself, for there is no intimation in the complaint that Mrs. McNeill was ever administratrix of any estate, or held any trust relation whatever with respect to the land in contest. Appellant says that he relies on section 1576, Code Civil Proc., which provides that no administrator must purchase or be interested in any sale of property of the estate; but that section is only a declaration of the pre-existing principle of law that a trustee must not deal with himself. The only thing that could upset respondent's title would be proof of a fraudulent conspiracy between her and Adams to conceal the true purchaser, but in the case at bar such proof could not be made without averment of the facts. In Jones v.

Hanna, 81 Cal. 507, 22 Pac. Rep. 883, so much relied on by appellant, not only were the facts and relations of the parties different from those in the case at bar, but in that case no question arose as to the sufficiency of the pleadings, or as to the admissibility of evidence under them. The points discussed arose upon the findings alone. No point is made against the respondent Catherine Kennedy. Judgment and order affirmed.

THOMASON v. DE GREAYER et al. (No. 14,802.)

REFORMATION OF CONTRACT—FRAUD—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. In an action to have his name inserted as one of the parties to a contract between defendant D. and defendant corporation, plaintiff alleged that his name was omitted through the fraud practiced by D. on the corporation and on plaintiff. Held, that the allegations were insufficient to sustain the action, since no facts constituting the fraud were set up.

2. Where two persons agreed to form a partnership for doing certain work before any contract for doing the work was obtained, and the partnership was never launched, and one of the parties carries on the work alone, the only remedy of the one excluded is an action at law for breach of contract. Powell v. Maguire, 43 Cal. 16, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by E. R. Thomason against Harry de Greayer and the Ferries & Cliff House Railway Company, a corporation, to reform a contract. From a judgment entered on an order sustaining defendants' separate demurrers to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Parker & Eells, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In July, 1891, the defendant De Greayer entered into a contract with the defendant corporation to pave with basalt stone blocks about five miles of the corporation's track in the city and county of San Francisco. On the 4th of August, 1891, De Greayer commenced doing the work which he had contracted to perform, and continued the same up to September 2d, when the plaintiff commenced this action, asking to have the "contract reformed by inserting his name as one of the contracting parties therein." The defendants demurred separately to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrers were sustained and the action dismissed. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered against him. The demurrers were properly sustained. The facts stated in the complaint were insufficient in several respects.

1. The averments that "said De Greayer, by fraud, deceit, and misrepresentations, omitted to have the plaintiff's name inserted in the contract with said corporation defendant for said work," and "that such omission was done through the fraud, deceit, and trickery practiced by said De Greayer on said corporation defendant and said plaintiff, and by mistake of said corporation," were not sufficient. The rule is that when a party relies upon fraud, either to support his cause of action, or in defense, he must set up the facts which constitute the fraud. "It is a well-established doctrine of equity pleading that a general charge of accident, mistake, or fraud is insufficient, though a plaintiff is not bound to set forth in his complaint all the minute facts constituting the grievance of which he complains. General certainty in these matters may be all that is required, still the facts constituting the fraud, where fraud is relied on as authorizing the interposition of the court, must be charged in the complaint." Kent v. Snyder, 30 Cal. 674; Capuro v. Insurance Co., 39 Cal. 123; and see cases cited on this point in Spring Valley Water Works v. City of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 321, 22 Pac. Rep. 910, 1046. Here no facts constituting the alleged fraud were set forth, and the complaint, therefore, failed to state the cause of action.

2. It is alleged that the terms of a copartnership between plaintiff and De Greayer, to do the work of paving, etc., five miles of track for said corporation, were "fully agreed upon" by the parties; but this was before any contract was obtained, and the partnership, therefore, was never "launched." This, being so, the rule declared in Powell v. Maguire, 43 Cal. 11, is applicable. It is stated in the syllabus as follows: "When two persons made an agreement to form a partnership, but such partnership was never launched, and one of the parties proceeded to conduct the enterprise in his own name, at his own cost, and for his exclusive benefit, excluding the other, and repudiating the partnership agreement, held, that an action by the latter to establish his right as a partner, and for an accounting, would not lie; his only remedy in such case being an action at law for breach of contract." The above disposes of the case, and it is not necessary to consider other points. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

KIRSCH v. DERBY. (No. 14,576.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1892.)

ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—PLEADING—SPECIAL DEMURRER.

1. In an action against an executor it is sufficient to allege that the will was duly admitted to probate; that letters testamentary were issued to him; and that he has been and now is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executor.

2. An objection to a complaint, on the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty, can be taken only by special demurrer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Action by Franz Kirsch against J. S. Derby, executor of the estate of Julia Kirsch, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff on default. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint is as follows: "Plaintiff complains of defendant, and for cause of action alleges: (1) That on the 28th day of March, 1890, one Julia Kirsch, who was the wife of plaintiff, died in above named county, and left an instrument purporting to be her last will and testament, wherein she named and appointed one J. S. Derby, above named, the executor of the same. (2) That on the 3d day of April, 1890, said J. S. Derby duly filed said alleged will in the office of the county clerk and clerk of the superior court of said county, together with his petition for the probate thereof and for letters testamentary thereon. (3) That thereafter, to wit, on the 5th day of May, 1890, upon proceedings duly had in that behalf in said superior court, said alleged will was duly admitted to probate by said court, and letters testamentary thereon were thereupon ordered to issue by said court to said J. S. Derby upon his qualifying as required by law. (4) That on or about the 8th day of May, 1890, said J. S. Derby duly qualified as such executor as aforesaid, and letters testamentary as aforesaid were thereupon issued to him by the clerk of said court, and that ever since said 8th day of May he has been and now is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executor of the said alleged will of said Julia Kirsch, deceased. (5) That on or about the 22d day of May, 1890, the defendant, as such executor as aforesaid, received the sum of $3,725 from the German Savings & Loan Society, (a corporation,) to and for the use of and belonging to plaintiff. (6) That thereafter, to wit, on the 31st day of May, 1890, plaintiff demanded of defendant the payment of said sum of $3,725, but that to so pay the same, or any part thereof, defendant refused, and ever since said day of May has refused, and still and now refuses, and that all of said sum of $3,725 is now due plaintiff by and from defendant. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant for said sum of $3,725, and for costs of suit."

Nye & Richardson, for appellant. Dodge & Fry, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Defendant made default in the court below, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals upon the judgment roll, and the point insisted on for a reversal is that the complaint is defective, because plaintiff, by said complaint, has not properly pleaded either the probate of the will of Julia Kirsch, deceased, or the appointment of defendant as executor. We are satisfied that the probate of the will and the executorship of appellant are sufficiently pleaded, (Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. Rep. 854; Wise v. Williams, 72 Cal. 547, 14 Pac. Rep. 204; Munro v. Reclamation Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. Rep. 303;) but the complaint states sufficient facts for a personal judgment against appellant. If there were any valid objections to the complaint on the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty, such objections could have been taken only by special demurrer. Demartin v. Albert, 68 Cal. 277, 9 Pac. Rep. 157; Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156; Blasingame v. Insurance Co., 75 Cal. 633, 17 Pac. Rep. 925; Heeser v. Miller, 77 Cal. 192, 19 Pac. Rep. 375.

The judgment is affirmed.

MUSSER v. GRAY. (No. 14,326.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

JUDGMENT—SATISFACTION.

M. held a judgment against G., which he agreed to release if G. would deliver him a deed to certain property, which he did. Prior to such agreement, G. had made an assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. M. knew that G. had made an assignment, but denied knowing that it included the specified property. G. made no attempt to conceal any fact. Held, that an order directing the entry of satisfaction of the judgment was proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Motion by E. P. Gray for an order directing the entry of satisfaction of a judgment against him held by J. W. Musser. From a judgment of the superior court of San Francisco county, affirming a judgment granting the order, Musser appeals. Affirmed.

Mich. Mullany and Wm. Grant, for appellant. A. Everett Ball, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from an order directing the entry of satisfaction of the judgment. The order was made on motion of defendant, on the ground that "said plaintiff has received satisfaction for said judgment, and that said defendant has been duly discharged by the insolvent court from said judgment." The order appealed from does not show upon which of these grounds it is based. It appears that plaintiff recovered a money judgment against defendant, February 18, 1887; that a writ of attachment had been theretofore issued, which had been duly levied upon a certain tract of land claimed by defendant in San Diego county; that after the entry of judgment an execution was issued and levied upon the same land, under which the land was sold to third parties for $37. The further sum of $250 was also collected by the sheriff on said execution, and after deducting his costs he paid to plaintiff's attorney $247.26, properly applicable to the judgment. Nothing more has ever been paid upon the judgment, but in defendant's affidavit, which was one of the papers upon which the motion was based, it is shown that on the 20th of May, 1887, defendant entered into an agreement with plaintiff and one Abbott, who also had a judgment against defendant, for the release and discharge of the judgment, which agreement is as follows: "In consideration of the delivery to Henry Abbott of a deed to the property of E. P. Gray, situate in San Diego county, state of California, we and each of us hereby agree that we will release the said E. P. Gray from any and all obligations to us or either of us owing, except in so far as his indebtedness to us is secured by virtue of an attachment levied upon the said property of the said E. P. Gray in said San Diego county. It being the intent of this agreement that the said parties hereto shall have the right to enforce their claim against the said Gray in so far as the same relates to the property of the said Gray situate in San Diego county, aforesaid, but to release him from any indebtedness to us remaining after realizing upon the said property. [Signed] J. W. MUSSER. HENRY ABBOTT. Dated May 20, 1887. Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of W. H. CHICKERING." That the deed mentioned in the agreement, by request of both plaintiff and Abbott, was executed and delivered to W. H. Chickering for them. It is then shown that defendant commenced proceedings to secure his discharge as an insolvent debtor under the laws of this state. Such proceedings were instituted in June, 1888, and a certificate of discharge was issued therein on November 12, 1888. A large portion of the record and of the briefs of counsel are taken up with questions in regard to the insolvency proceedings, but, as the discharge could not justify the action of the court below, the points made in regard to these proceedings need not be considered at length. It does not appear that the claim of plaintiff was proven against the insolvent. Although a creditor loses his debt through such proceedings, that does not make it his duty to surrender and cancel the evidences of his debt, if any he has. On the contrary, the statute expressly makes the order and certificate only prima facie evidence of the release of the debtor from his debts, and allows the creditor two years to discover such fraud as will avoid its effect. Such discharge will perhaps prevent the creditor from getting any benefit from his judgment, but it does not impose upon him the duty of entering a satisfaction of it. Unless it did make it the duty of the plaintiff, the court had no right to force him so to enter it.

The only matter, therefore, to be considered is whether the agreement to accept a deed to the land in San Diego county, and release the debt except as to the reserved right to prosecute the attachment, will justify the order. Upon the hearing of the motion a counter affidavit made by plaintiff was read. He admits that he signed the release, but charged that it was obtained through fraud; that defendant had become greatly indebted, and on the 6th of December, 1886, executed and delivered to one Henry P. Wood a deed of assignment of all his property, including the San Diego lands, for the benefit of his creditors, and that said Wood ever since has been and now is the owner of said lands for the purposes of the trust; that he did not know when he signed the release that the San Diego lands were included, and that he derived no benefit from, and acquired no rights under, the deed to him; that defendant's brother and attorney, Giles H. Gray, assumed to represent defendant, who immediately after the execution of the deed to Wood absconded; that Giles H. Gray, acting for his brother, continuously gave out, and made it appear and represented to him, (affiant,) that defendant was the owner of the San Diego lands, and had conveyed them to him, (Giles H.,) and that he would convey them to said Abbott upon the execution of the release by plaintiff and said Abbott to E. P. Gray; that thus he was led and induced to believe said Giles H. Gray could and would convey to Henry Abbott a good title for the San Diego lands, and that affiant would realize and obtain ample money to satisfy the judgment; and acting upon and in pursuance of said representations and deception, and not otherwise, he did enter into the agreement mentioned, but he never received any consideration therefor, but the same is void. These statements are corroborated by an affidavit of one A. S. Hubbard, who claims to own a part of the judgment and of the indebtedness secured thereby. Giles H. Gray made an affidavit corroborating the first affidavit of defendant.

In reply to the counter affidavits of plaintiff and Hubbard, defendant deposed admitting the deed to Wood, but stating that Wood did not comply with the law in regard to such assignments. He filed no inventory as required by section 3461, Civil Code, or affidavit as required by section 3462, Id., and executed no bond as required by section 3467, Id., all of which was well known to plaintiff. That Wood has never been the owner of the San Diego land, in trust or otherwise, and plaintiff acquired through Chickering all the title defendant had to the land. He denies that he absconded or concealed himself. The affidavit of W. H. Chickering was also read. He deposed that he was attorney for Abbott. That an assignment was made to Wood, but that Wood never completed the assignment. That acting under instructions he received the deed for the San Diego lands, and plaintiff and Abbott in consideration of it executed the release. That the transaction was had when real estate was "excited" at San Diego, and it was thought by Abbott and plaintiff that enough could be realized from the property to satisfy their claims. A large portion of the property had been previously sold under foreclosure, but it was thought the decree could be set aside, but the collapse of the boom came so soon that no steps were taken to vacate the foreclosure decree. That there was no attempt made to conceal any facts, and, in the opinion of affiant, defendant and his brother acted in entire good faith. The release was given without reservation, and the deed was received by him in trust for plaintiff and Abbott. In reply to these affidavits, another was read, made by Hubbard, in which he affirms that Wood accepted the deed of assignment, and had the same recorded in this city and county, December 6, 1886, and complied with the law pertaining thereto, executed the bond, assumed the duties, and as assignee sold a large amount of property, and divided the proceeds among some of the creditors of defendant.

Upon this evidence, is the conclusion of the court reasonable? Appellant in effect admits that he knew that Gray had made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but denies that he knew that the San Diego property was included. Whether it was included or not he does not seem to have inquired. No such representations as to title are charged as would excuse him from an examination of the records. The court on the evidence was justified in concluding that the assignment to creditors did not constitute a cloud upon the title acquired, and, while it is said that plaintiff derived no benefit from the conveyance, no facts are stated which tend to show that the failure to do so was caused by the assignment. Chickering's affidavit refutes all presumption of intentional deception. I think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

ROBERTS v. LEVY. (No. 14,990.)

Physician and Surgeon—Claims against Decedent—License.

1. There can be no recovery on a complaint against an administrator, alleging that a demand was made for services as an "expert nurse and medical attendant," when in fact the claim presented was for "medical attendance on deceased during his lifetime."

2. A party cannot recover for services rendered as physician and surgeon unless he has a certificate to practice medicine and surgery, as required by statute.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by J. W. Roberts against Eugene W. Levy, administrator, for medical services. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. H. Hart, (Aylett R. Cotton and Nowlin & Fassett, of counsel,) for appellant. Gunnison & Booth, (Walter J. Bartnett, of counsel,) for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. As appears by the complaint, the action was brought to recover for services rendered by plaintiff as an "expert nurse and surgical and medical attendant" to one Goodwin, now deceased, the respondent being the administrator of his estate. The complaint alleges a presentation and rejection of the claim upon which the action is founded, and a copy of said claim is thereto attached as a part thereof. The claim is made out and sworn to in the name of Dr. J. W. Roberts, and purports to be for "medical attendance on said deceased during his lifetime," etc. Then follows an itemized statement of the number of visits, the character of services rendered, and the charges therefor. As matters of fact the court found the services were rendered by plaintiff as a physician and surgeon, and that at the time of their rendition plaintiff had no certificate to practice medicine and surgery, as is required by the statute, and thereupon rendered judgment for defendant. The complaint is ambiguous and uncertain in this: that the claim presented to the administrator appears to have been for medical services, while the complaint proper alleges a demand for services of an expert nurse and medical and surgical attendant; but no special demurrer was interposed, and the evidence at the trial appears to have been directed to the point as to whether the plaintiff rendered the services in the character of an expert nurse or as a medical practitioner. Viewing the case from either standpoint, the plaintiff must fail to recover. If his complaint and evidence is addressed to the theory that he was an "expert nurse and surgical and medical attendant," then his case is not supported by the claim presented to the administrator. If plaintiff stands upon the claim for medical services which was presented to the administrator, then his failure to procure a certificate to practice medicine as required by the statute defeats his right of recovery. This was so decided in Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 Pac. Rep. 880. Thus, under either aspect of the case, plaintiff is met with insurmountable difficulties. Various exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting testimony as to the capacity in which plaintiff acted, but, owing to the views already expressed, such exceptions become immaterial. Under the complaint, viewed favorably to plaintiff, he could only recover for medical services, and, considering the proof was ample in this regard, still this failure to possess himself of a certificate to practice was fatal to his cause, and his exceptions to the rulings of the court upon other matters are of no benefit to him.

Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

JENKINS v. GAMEWELL FIRE ALARM TEL. CO. et al. (No. 14,249.)

Judgment by Default—Affidavit to Set Aside—Affidavit of Merits.

1. An affidavit to set aside a judgment by default is not sufficient where it shows that defendants served notice of appearance on plaintiff's attorneys, but does not show that they agreed to extend defendants' time to answer, or that defendants supposed their time had been extended.

2. An affidavit of merits, stating facts on information and belief, is insufficient, as being hearsay.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by A. L. Jenkins against the Gamewell Fire Alarm Telegraph Company and others. From an order setting aside a judgment by default, plaintiff appeals.

Dorn & Dorn and Maxwell & McEnerny, for appellant. H. B. M. Miller, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Appeal from an order setting aside a judgment by default, defendants having failed to answer within the time allowed by law. Conceding the facts to be as stated in respondents' affidavit, still no showing of excusable neglect is made. There is nothing in the affidavit to indicate that plaintiff's attorneys either expressly or impliedly agreed to extend defendants' time to answer, or that defendants supposed their time had been extended. In referring to the discretion of the trial court in these matters, it was said in Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424: "The discretion intended, however, is not a capricious or arbitrary discretion, but an impartial discretion, guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles. * * * If, on the contrary, we are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the court below has come to an erroneous conclusion, the party complaining of the error is as much entitled to a reversal in a case like the present as in any other." This is no question of conflict of evidence, but defendants' affidavit, standing alone, fails to reach the mark.

The affidavit of merits is also insufficient. It states that one of the defendants has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to affiant, (defendants' attorney,) and he believes that said defendants have a good and substantial defense, etc. Affiant's information as to the facts of the case is purely hearsay. Bailey v. Taaffe, supra, with sound reason holds such an affidavit of no avail.

Let the order be reversed.

FRANKE v. FRANKE. (No. 14,532.)

MARRIAGE—PROCEEDING TO ANNUL—FRAUD.

1. Where a man marries a woman whom he has debauched before marriage, and whom he knew to be pregnant at the time of marriage, he cannot have the marriage annulled on the ground that he was deceived by the false assurances of the wife that he was the father of the child, and that she had been chaste to all others, under Civil Code, § 82, providing for annulling marriages where the consent of either party was obtained by fraud.

2. The fact that the woman was pregnant at the time of her marriage is not ground for setting the marriage aside under Civil Code, §§ 58, 82, for physical incapacity.

Action by Rudolph Franke against Wilhelmine Augusta Franke to annul marriage. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. M. F. Soto, Carroll Cook, and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. A. A. Moore and Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to annul marriage, on the ground that plaintiff's consent to marry was obtained by fraud, and upon the further and distinct ground that the defendant was physically incapable of entering into the marriage state. The cause having been tried by the court, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The complaint, after stating the marriage on the 15th day of September, 1889, generally and meagerly alleges the cause of action as follows: "(3) For the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to consent to the said marriage, the defendant falsely and fraudulently represented that she was chaste and virtuous, and physically competent to marry plaintiff, and concealed from plaintiff her real condition, claiming then to be pregnant by plaintiff, but chaste and virtuous as to all other men, and that, save plaintiff, she had never had sexual intercourse or connection with any man. All which representations were false and fraudulent. (4) That defendant was not then and there physically competent to marry plaintiff, but was at the time of said marriage pregnant by some other man than plaintiff. (5) That plaintiff relied upon said representations, and was induced to consent to the said marriage by the said representations, and, if the same had not been made, and said concealment practiced, he would have never consented to the said marriage. (6) That upon the discovery of the falsity of the said representations the plaintiff ceased to cohabit with the defendant, and has never since cohabited with her." The answer of the defendant specially denies that she made the false and fraudulent representations charged, and denies that she was physically incompetent to marry the plaintiff; admits that she was pregnant by the plaintiff at and before the marriage, and denies that she was so by any other man, and alleges that before the marriage she fully informed the plaintiff of her true condition.

The court found as follows: "(1) That on the 15th day of September, 1889, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, plaintiff and defendant intermarried. (2) That on or about the 20th day of April, 1889, plaintiff and defendant had voluntary sexual intercourse with each other, and that on or about the 14th day of August, 1889, and at divers other times in said month before the date of said marriage, defendant and defendant's then attorney, James Herrmann, represented to plaintiff that defendant was pregnant and with child by plaintiff, and that she was chaste and virtuous as to all other men, and that she was physically competent to marry plaintiff. (3) That plaintiff, to satisfy himself of the truth or falsity of these representations, did, before his said marriage with said defendant, act as a careful and prudent man should act, and in all respects used due and proper care. (4) That at and after the making of said representations, and at and after the marriage of said plaintiff and defendant, defendant concealed from plaintiff her true condition. That defendant, at and prior to the making of said representations, and at the time of her marriage with said plaintiff, was pregnant, not by plaintiff, but by a man other than plaintiff. (5) That plaintiff, at and after the time of his marriage with defendant, believed in and relied upon the said representations, and in consequence of said representations and belief plaintiff was deceived into and induced to consent to said marriage; and if said representations had not been made, and said concealment of her true condition practiced by defendant upon plaintiff, plaintiff would not have intermarried with defendant. That the said representations, and each and all of them, were untrue and false and fraudulent, and at the time said representations were made by defendant to plaintiff defendant well knew that they were untrue, false, and fraudulent. (6) That defendant, by reason of the fact that she was pregnant by a man other than plaintiff, was at the time she married plaintiff physically incompetent to marry him, and that her concealment from plaintiff of her true condition was a fraud upon plaintiff. (7) That plaintiff did not discover the fraud which had been practiced upon him by defendant until on or about the 28th day of October, 1889, and that immediately upon such discovery he ceased to cohabit with defendant, has never since cohabited with her, and acted promptly and with the highest good faith to procure an annulment of his marriage."

It is claimed by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of fact in several material particulars, and also that the findings do not warrant the judgment. The only evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties before their marriage is the testimony of the plaintiff, which is not fully nor quite fairly represented by the findings, either as to the first time nor the number of times it occurred, or as to the period during which it continued, since these circumstances were material, as we shall see, as bearing upon plaintiff's antenuptial knowledge of defendant's character for chastity. The plaintiff testified that in March, 1889, he was a widower, 40 years of age, residing in Oakland, Alameda county, with his family of five children,—a son aged 14 years, a daughter aged 11 years, and three younger children. That the defendant then resided with her parents in San Francisco, and (as appears by other testimony) was only 17 years of age. That for some time plaintiff had been acquainted with her parents, but had not known the defendant until she came to his house in Oakland, to visit his children, in March, 1889. He did not meet her again until the 18th or 19th day of April following, when she again visited his children, and remained at his house all night. After playing cards with her and his children until about 9 o'clock that evening, he directed her and his children to retire to bed, which they did, she going to a bedroom with some of the children, and he remaining in the sitting room on a sofa, where he fell asleep. About an hour after defendant had gone to her bedroom, she returned to the room where he was sleeping on the sofa, and awoke him by tickling his nose with a feather duster. He then told her "that was dangerous business, and that she had better go to bed, and have nothing to do with it." She persisted, however, "fooling around him and playing," and the result was that both went to his bedroom, and there, for the first time, had sexual intercourse, which was repeated the next day about 11 o'clock A. M. Thereafter she visited at his house about once a week, staying all night, and going to his bed. He does not remember how often these visits occurred, but thinks 10 or 12 times. They must have continued through the month of May and a part of June. He further testified that on the first occasion he told her he "was afraid of the business," and that she said: "You needn't be afraid; that is all right; I have got my protector," (meaning her beau.) As a matter of precaution, however, he used what he called "a protector," to prevent conception, which he seems to have had at hand on the first occasion, but which he says was not successful about the third time it was used, and within the month of April. The use of this instrument is one of the reasons assigned by him for doubting, at the time of the marriage, that he was the father of the child.

On August 22, 1889, the defendant—then Miss Bruhn, and still a minor—by her guardian, Peter F. Bruhn, her father, commenced an action against the plaintiff herein to recover $50,000 damages for seduction, alleged to have been accomplished on the 18th day of March, 1889. It appears that plaintiff herein had notice that defendant was pregnant, and claimed that he was the father of the child, before the action for seduction was commenced, but it does not appear by what means he was notified, nor that any demand had been made upon him either to marry or pay damages before the commencement of that action. Nor does it appear that he was ever requested by defendant or her parents to marry her. He testified that he called upon her at her father's house a day or two after the action for seduction was commenced, and complained that no effort had been made to settle the matter quietly with him before commencing the action, and that she then said she had not advised the action, and that her father had commenced it without her approval. He then told her in the presence of her mother that if he was the father of the child, he was willing to marry her, and "that they had no business to go to law about it." Plaintiff further testified that the defendant first told him that he and no other man was the father of the child at her lawyer's office, on the day they got their marriage license, (September 15th,) and that her lawyer—Mr. Herrmann—then made her swear to it; and that her lawyer promised that if the time of the birth of the child should not correspond with plaintiff's reckoning, he (the lawyer) "would get plaintiff free without a cent." It also appears that while the seduction suit was pending the plaintiff therein and her lawyer offered to settle and dismiss the suit for $1,300 if plaintiff was not content to marry. He preferred to marry, though, he said, he always doubted that he was the father, rather than "throw money away" in payment of alleged damages. The child was born October 27th, six months and nine days after the first admitted act of coition, and one month and twelve days after the marriage, and, in the opinion of medical witnesses, had the appearance of a child not prematurely born. These circumstances, with the testimony of plaintiff as to the time of his first intercourse with defendant, must be regarded as sufficient to justify the findings that plaintiff was not the father of the child, and that defendant's representations before marriage, that she had been virtuous as to all other men than plaintiff, were willfully false. Yet, considering her age and inexperience, she may not have known before marriage that plaintiff was not the father, though for good reason she may have doubted that he was. But assuming, as we must, that the finding that he was not the father is true, she willfully asserted what she did not know to be true, and what she had good reason to doubt, at least; and to this extent the finding that "she well knew" that her representation that plaintiff was the father "was false and fraudulent" should be qualified. The finding that plaintiff and defendant had sexual intercourse "on or about the 20th day of April, 1889," should also be qualified and characterized by the circumstances of the intercourse, shown by the testimony of the plaintiff; otherwise, material traits and features of the character of that intercourse are hidden from view. The comparative ages and experience of the parties, his relation to her as a visitor of his children at his house, the conduct of both parties on the first occasion, the frequency of the intercourse, the length of time it continued, and the absence of any pretense of virtue on her part while it continued, are material, as tending to show her then apparent character for virtue, the extent to which he was particeps criminis in her incontinence, and that he had not sufficient reason to be deceived by her false representations made to him for the first time on the day he procured the marriage license.

But, accepting the findings as they appear in the record, I think they do not warrant the judgment on the ground of fraud. The Civil Code, § 82, provides that a marriage may be annulled on the ground "that the consent of either party was obtained by fraud." The only case in this state in which a marriage has been annulled on this ground is that of Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 88. In that case the defendant (wife) was pregnant by a stranger at the time of marriage, but the husband had no sexual intercourse with her, or any other reason to suspect her chastity, before marriage, and did not know or suspect that she was pregnant at the time of marriage; whereas, in this case, the plaintiff participated in the incontinence of his wife before marriage, and also knew her to be pregnant at the time of marriage, and even then doubted, as well he might, that he was the father. Our Civil Code does not define the kind or degree of fraud required to annul a marriage, but no one will contend that every kind and degree of fraud which would be sufficient to annul an ordinary contract would also be sufficient to annul a marriage contract, consent to which had been induced by it. Under these circumstances, it is proper to consult the decisions of the highest courts of other states construing similar statutes. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 496. Statutes of other states similar to sections 58 and 82 of our Civil Code, authorizing the nullification of marriage on the ground of fraud simply, without defining the kind or degree of the fraud, have been uniformly construed as being merely jurisdictional, and to mean that kind of fraud defined by the unwritten law applicable to marriage contracts, (Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 475 and 478; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Scroggins v. Scroggins, 3 Dev. 535;) and under such statutes it has been held almost uniformly that where a man marries a woman whom he has debauched before marriage, and whom he knew to be pregnant with child at the time of marriage, the marriage will not be annulled on the ground that he was deceived by the false assurances of the wife before marriage that he was the father of the child, and that she had been chaste with all other men. Having experienced and participated in her incontinence before marriage, he is thereby sufficiently apprised of her want of chastity to deprive him of the right to complain that he was deceived by her false assurances that he was the only participant in her illicit intercourse. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 609; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Crehore v. Crehore, 97 Mass. 330; Scroggins v. Scroggins, 3 Dev. 535; Long v. Long, 77 N. C. 305; Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 517; Seilheimer v. Seilheimer, 40 N. J. Eq. 412, 2 Atl. Rep. 376; Varney v. Varney, 52 Wis. 120, 8 N. W. Rep. 739; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 483 et seq.

The only authority for any exception to the rule, as above stated, which I have been able to find, is to be found in the extreme cases of Barden v. Barden, 3 Dev. 548, and Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43, in each of which the parties were white, and the child begotten before marriage was a mulatto. Each of these cases was decided upon the facts stated in the complaint, and upon a demurrer. In the first, RUFFIN, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, expressly characterized his concurrence in it as "a concession to the deep-rooted and virtuous prejudices of the community upon the subject." Another distinguishing attribute upon which the exception is said to have been grounded is that "the blood of the woman, as physiologists tell us, has been tainted by mingling with that of the first (mulatto) child, and she is incapable of bearing children that will not show the mixture of African blood." See dissenting opinion of RODMAN, J., in Long v. Long, 77 N. C. 304. In each of those cases the mulatto child had been born before the marriage, but the putative father, in one case, had not seen it, and in the other had not discovered that it was a mulatto, until after marriage. In the New York case (Scott v. Shufeldt) the court said: "If the child had not been born at the time of the marriage, the complainant would have had some difficulty in showing that he had been intentionally deceived and defrauded by the defendant, as she might possibly have supposed the child to be his, although she had also had connection with a negro about the same time." Possibly other extremely hard cases may occur sufficiently distinguishable from the cases above cited to justify additional exceptions to the rule, but such cases need not be anticipated, since this case certainly is not one of them.

So far as plaintiff's alleged grievance is founded upon fraud, the substance of it is, according to his own testimony, that at the mature age of 40 years, after a matrimonial experience during which 5 children were born to him, he was seduced by a girl aged 17 years,—the daughter of a neighbor,—while visiting his children at his own house, and therefore virtually under his protection, and whom, indeed, he says, he endeavored to protect from the natural consequence of her indiscretion, so far as he could, in his then helpless condition, by the use of "a protector," which it seems he had prudently provided for such an occasion. Nevertheless she afterwards claimed that such natural consequence had not been averted, and brought suit against him for seduction, falsely charging that he was the father of her unborn child, and praying judgment for damages. That, rather than "give money away" in settlement of that suit, he elected to marry her on her assurance that he was the father, and the further assurance of her attorney that if the time of the birth of the child should not correspond with plaintiff's reckoning, the attorney would get him free "without a cent;" though at the time of the marriage he doubted that he was the father of the child, and although by postponing the nuptials two months he might have verified his reckoning. The whole substance of the fraud proved consisted of her false representations that she had been chaste with all other men than plaintiff, which, under the circumstances of this case, partly on grounds of public policy, has been deemed insufficient in degree to warrant the annullment of a marriage. The reasons for the rule are fully set forth in the case above cited.

The finding that defendant was physically incompetent to marry the plaintiff is not justified by the evidence, as there is no evidence tending to prove that she was diseased or defective in physical organization. This ground for annullment of marriage, as expressed in sections 58 and 82 of the Civil Code, is entirely distinct from that of fraud. It consists solely of such physical defect or incurable disease existing at the time of marriage as will prevent sexual coition. Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 757, 766, 768. The case of Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 88, has no bearing whatever upon the question of physical incapacity as a cause for the annullment of a marriage. That was an action for a divorce on the sole ground of fraud, and the judgment of the appellate court was placed upon that ground alone, in accordance with the fifth subdivision of section 4 of the act of March 25, 1851, (Wood's Dig. [1st Ed.] p. 491,) which section also made "natural impotence, existing at the time of marriage," a cause of divorce; but there was no pretense of such impotence in that case; nor was there any statute in this state, prior to the decision in that case, providing for the annullment of a marriage on the ground of physical incapacity. The case of Baker v. Baker was considered in Carris v. Carris, supra, 24 N. J. Eq. 522, and construed as being consistent with the decision in the latter case. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

Ex parte STRONG. (No. 15,255.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1892.)

HABEAS CORPUS—FAILURE TO BRING TO TRIAL.

Though defendant is entitled to have the information filed against him dismissed under Pen. Code, § 1382, which provides for such dismissal "if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed on his application, is not brought to trial within 60 days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information," he is not entitled to a discharge on habeas corpus until the information is dismissed.

Application of John Strong for a discharge from imprisonment on habeas corpus. Denied.

C. W. Thomas, J. Craig, and J. E. Strong, for petitioner. R. E. Hopkins, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus based upon the following allegations: The petitioner was accused by information filed September 8, 1892, of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. More than 90 days have since elapsed, but he has not been brought to trial. He has made no application for a postponement, and there is no excuse for the delay. He has asked the superior court in which the accusation is pending to order the prosecution to be dismissed, and that motion has been denied. These allegations, if true, show that it was the duty of the superior court to dismiss the prosecution, (Pen. Code, § 1382;)[1] but until the information is dismissed the imprisonment is lawful. Writ denied.

[1] The section provides that "the court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him within thirty days thereafter; (2) if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information."

CALANCHINI v. BRANSTETTER. (No. 14,648.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

Plaintiff alleged that C., his grantor, and B., defendant's grantor, their boundary being disputed, agreed on a temporary boundary; and that, when the true boundary was found, the one in possession of land belonging to the other should have the option either to buy such land at its value in the unreclaimed condition, or surrender it on being paid the cost of reclaiming, and sought to compel defendant to sell a strip of land found to be in plaintiff's possession after a survey. B. testified that he agreed to pay C., after the true boundary was established, by the acre for all he cleared over the true line. C. testified that he always claimed the land to the temporary line agreed on, and never told plaintiff of the agreement. Defendant had no notice of any agreement except the one testified to by B. Held, that plaintiff's possession was insufficient to constitute notice of such agreement to defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Philip Calanchini against Lewis P. Branstetter to enforce specifically an oral agreement to sell land. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. M. Buck, (W. C. Belcher, of counsel,) for appellant. P. F. Hart and J. D. H. Chamberlin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is the second appeal in this case. The first (84 Cal. 249, 24 Pac. Rep. 149) was by the plaintiff from a judgment against him, in which a new trial was awarded. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment against him, and from an order refusing him a new trial. Upon the last trial the court adopted the former findings of fact, adding one or two others. The evidence upon the first trial was for convenience read on the second trial, although there was some little additional testimony. The facts of the case are substantially as stated in the opinion rendered on the former appeal. In some respects, however, they are presented in a different aspect, owing to the fact that the first appeal was by the plaintiff, and this is by the defendant. At the first trial the facts were found generally as claimed by the plaintiff, but were held not to warrant a judgment in his favor. Defendant, being then respondent, could not object to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, or bring up any evidence except such as related to the points made by plaintiff in his motion for a new trial. While, therefore, the opinion rendered upon the first appeal has become the law of the case, and will control here, so far as it appears that the same points are presented upon the same facts, there are in this appeal many questions not then considered, and some that were then passed upon are now presented in a new light. In 1882 the grantor of plaintiff, Chamberlin, was the owner of a tract of 40 acres of swamp and overflowed land, adjoining and south of a similar tract owned by Baldwin, from whom defendant derives his title. The land was wet and thickly covered with brush, so that it was difficult to make an accurate survey of it. The boundary between the tracts was a quarter section line. The owners of adjoining tracts of similar lands had fenced along what was believed to be this quarter section line, and it was easy to determine about where the line, as fenced, would divide the said tracts if it were extended. Chamberlin, however, desiring to reclaim his land, caused a survey to be made which located the boundary some 18 or 20 rods south of the line indicated by neighboring fences. This was in July, 1882. Both Chamberlin and Baldwin were present when the survey was made. No marks or stakes or other evidence of the government survey were found on the line between these tracts. Chamberlin then stoutly maintained that the boundary indicated by the neighboring fences was the true boundary, while Baldwin claimed according to the survey. A compromise was then effected, and it was agreed that the line indicated by the neighboring fences should temporarily divide their possessions. The agreement was oral, and Chamberlin and Baldwin differ materially as to its terms; from this difference this litigation has arisen. This suit is founded upon Chamberlin's version, which is that it was agreed that, when the true line was found, whichever was found to have in possession land belonging to the other should have the option either to buy such land at its value then in its unreclaimed condition, or to surrender it upon being paid the cost of reclaiming. Baldwin, on the other hand, testified that, when the land was cleared so that the line could be accurately surveyed, it was agreed simply, to use his own language, that "I would pay him by the acre for all he cut over the line after the line was regularly established." He denies that Chamberlin was to have the privilege of purchasing. After the compromise, the parties proceeded to dig a trench and build a fence along the agreed line, and in the following spring (1883) Chamberlin reclaimed his land up to the conventional line, which included the demanded premises. November 3, 1883, Baldwin conveyed his land to Rachel Branstetter. July 3, 1884, Chamberlin sold and conveyed his tract to plaintiff, describing it as the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 7, etc. This did not in terms include the land in controversy, and the contract was not assigned to plaintiff. In fact, Calanchini was not told of the agreement. On the contrary, Chamberlin told him that the fence was on the line, and that his title under the patent covered all the land. Defendant acquired the Baldwin tract December 31, 1884, paying therefor $70 per acre. He had no actual knowledge of the alleged oral agreement, except that he heard Baldwin's version. He did not know that any different claim was asserted, either by Chamberlin or Calanchini, and supposed that his right to the land when the boundary was settled, upon paying the cost of clearing, was admitted. Shortly after his purchase defendant had the land surveyed, and then the original government corners with evidence of the original survey in marks upon the ground was found. Branstetter then called upon Calanchini, informed him of the survey and of the true boundary, and demanded possession of his land, offering to pay the cost of improvements made upon the land. Calanchini denied that he had in possession any land belonging to Branstetter, and all knowledge of any contract in regard to it. He claimed that he had bought from Chamberlin up to the fence.

Defendant then called upon Chamberlin, and offered to pay him for clearing the land, according to the contract between Chamberlin and Baldwin, as he understood it. There is some difference between the witnesses as to what transpired there, but it is certain that no hint was given then by Chamberlin that he understood the oral contract differently. No claim of a right to purchase was asserted by either Chamberlin or Calanchini. The court found as a fact that the agreement was as claimed by Chamberlin, and "that both the said Rachel Branstetter and defendant took the conveyance of said land with notice of the agreement made between said Baldwin and Chamberlin." Whether defendant was a purchaser in good faith and for value was an issue in the case, and this finding is attacked as not supported by the evidence. Defendant testified that he had never heard of any such agreement, and there is no evidence which tends to show that he had. On the contrary, the facts seem to indicate that it was impossible that he should have had actual knowledge, for Baldwin testified that he had never heard of the agreement for an option to purchase, and Chamberlin seems equally positive that he never mentioned it.

Was plaintiff's possession, then, sufficient to impart notice? Plainly not. Plaintiff was then a stranger to the claim, having no interest in the alleged agreement, and, had he been asked, could not have told of it, for he had never heard of any such alleged agreement himself. For both reasons such possession does not constitute notice. Wade, Notice, § 289; Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 557; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 27 Pac. Rep. 356.

Chamberlin was not then in possession, and made no claim to the land, and not to have inquired of him was not negligence. Had such inquiries been made, however, it is evident, from Chamberlin's testimony at the trial, that they would have been unavailing. His testimony was that, from the time that he took possession, he never admitted that any of the land in controversy belonged to Baldwin; that he always claimed the land, and supposed that he could hold it adversely to the world, until it was decided in court that it belonged to the defendant; that, until the suit of the present defendant against the plaintiff herein, he never admitted that he was liable to pay for any portion of this land, or claimed any rights under the so-called agreement. This finding is therefore not sustained by the evidence, and for this reason the judgment and order must be reversed. As the cause must be tried anew, it is proper to notice an exception taken to the ruling of the court upon the admission of certain evidence. On the trial of the cause the plaintiff offered in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Branstetter v. Calanchini for the purpose of proving the oral agreement alleged in his complaint. The defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence as incompetent, for certain reasons represented by him at length, and now assigns as error the action of the court in overruling his objections. The ruling of the court upon the offer of this evidence was erroneous, but, as the defendant himself afterwards offered the same judgment roll in evidence as a bar to the present action, he waived the right to question the action of the court in previously admitting it.

The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

In re BERTON'S ESTATE. (No. 15,035.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1892.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—EDUCATION OF CHILDREN—DISTRIBUTION.

Testatrix, after leaving a sum of money to each of her two children, a son and a daughter, divided the estate equally between the children and the husband. In case of the death of the husband before the children's majority, his share was to go to the children. The son was to receive his share at the age of 25, and the daughter at 20, if she married; the children's education "to be paid for out of the interests of my estate." Held, that the charge for education was upon the whole estate, and that, even conceding the legacies to be vested legacies, distribution could not be had until the charge was satisfied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Bertha Berton, deceased. Flavien Berton, executor, appeals from an order denying his petition for distribution. Affirmed.

Sidney V. Smith, for appellant. Napthaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order of the probate court denying the petition of appellant, as executor of the will of the deceased, for a distribution of the estate. The petition was filed at the same time as the account for final settlement of his accounts as executor. Due notice was given, and at the time appointed the final account was approved and settled. Due proof was made of notice to creditors that the time for the presentation of claims had elapsed, and that all claims against the estate, and the expenses of administration, and all taxes levied on the estate, had been paid, and that there was left in the hands of the executor for distribution, $84,450.94. The testatrix left two children, a son and a daughter. The record shows that the son was then, when the final account was settled, 19 years of age, and the daughter over 18. The will bears date April 18, 1887. The executor was appointed May 3, 1888. The final settlement was November 12, 1891. It is said that distribution was refused on the ground that the will had not then been fully executed; that, according to its terms, the estate could not then be distributed.

The material portion of the will reads as follows: "I desire to give to my only two beloved children, Michael Albert Tschurr, born in San Francisco, and now residing with my beloved father, Michael Corai, in Zug-Graubunden, Switzerland, and my daughter, Anna Paulina Catharina Tschurr, born and now residing in San Francisco, the summe of ten thousand dollars each, share and share alike; this is to be theyr separate part of my estate, which I give to them. I further give and bequeath the balance of my estate, of which I may die seised or possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my decease, to my beloved husband, Flavien Berton, of the city and county of San Francisco, my beloved son, Michael Albert Tschurr, and my beloved daughter, Anna Paulina Catharina Tschurr, share and share alike. Each to receive one third of my estate after my two named children will have received theyr ten thousand dollars each. My beloved son shall receive his share of my estate at the time he attains the age of twenty-five years. It is my wish that my only daughter should not mary before she attains the age of twenty years. At that time, if she maries, she to receive all her part of my estate, this to be forever her own separate property outside of five thousand dollars, which shall be her mother's wedding gift. Her husband never to have any right to the balance of her estate, but the interests, her estate to be and remain her own separate property, at the time of her decease to go to her children, or if there are no children, one half to be given to her husband, the other half to her brother or his hevers. Should it please God to call one of my children from this earth before they should be maried or have family, theyr share to go share and share alike to theyr stepfather or brother or sister. It is my will that my children above named, being the children of my dearly beloved husband, Christian Tschurr, deceased, be well educated, theyr education to be paid out of the interests of my estate. My son to choos the proffession he wishes or has talent for. I do nominate, constitute and apoint my beloved husband, Flavien Berton, of the city and county of San Francisco, to be the executor of this, my last will and testament. I have full confidence that he will do all in his power to promote the wellfare of my two named children, and in this confidence he shall not be obliged to give any bonds whatever. He shall have full power to sell at public or private sale, at such time as he may deem best, all the property, real or personal, of which I may die seised or possessed, and to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease. Should my dear husband, Flavien Berton, be called from this earth before my two children attain theyr majority, his share of my estate to go back to my said two children. Should he remary, he to have only fife thousand dollars of my estate, the balance to go back to my two children, share and share alike. My beloved husband's father, Jean Berton, residing at St. Sorlin Drom, France, I wish in case of our decease to get one hundred dollars jearly for the time of his life, this contribution to be paid out of the interests of my estate and to cease at the time of his decease."

The appellant claims that the bequest to the husband vested at once, and the condition that the property shall go back to the children of the testatrix, in the event of his death before the children reach the age of majority, is a condition subsequent. It is obvious, from a mere reading of the will, that when the property shall be finally distributed under it, many fine and perhaps difficult points can be raised in regard to the effect of some of the language used. As yet the probate court has not construed its provisions further than to say that the estate is not now in a condition to be taken from the executor's hands, and it would hardly be proper to go further here than is necessary to determine that question. To determine that, it does not seem necessary to say whether the legacies are vested or not. Although, if the only provisions of the will bearing upon the question were those discussed by the appellant, the solution of the matter would not be difficult; but there are several other provisions. The language of the first two clauses of the will is the same in regard to the surviving husband and the children, and yet the third paragraph provides that the son shall receive his share when he attains the age of 25 years, and the daughter when she attains the age of 20, if she marries. Another clause, further on, provides that her children shall be well educated, their education to be paid for out of the interests of her estate. There is no provision made for the support of the children before their legacies were to be received by them, unless it is implied in this provision as to their education. Nor is there any express direction or authority given the executor to invest the money belonging to the estate, so that there may be any interest from her estate. Still it is quite evident that the testatrix intended that the property might be for some time in the hands of the executor. The legacy to the son was not to be received by him until he attained the age of 25 years. He must have been about 15 when the will was executed. It does not appear when she died, but the executor was appointed about one year after the date of the will. She must have contemplated that about 10 years might elapse before her son reached the age of 25. No trustee is provided for, except the executor, who becomes such merely as executor. Evidently the charge for the education of the children is upon the whole estate. It would be impracticable, and might defeat the purpose of the charge, to distribute the property subject to the burden. The boy was not to have his share anyway, and there is no express provision for him in the mean time except this. The amount which might be required could not be settled in advance, and it was necessary that it should be promptly and certainly forthcoming. It cannot be held that she meant to leave the education of her children subject to the chance that the necessary contributions could be collected from the distributees, who might become insolvent, or be beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Even conceding that the legacies were all vested, and that payment only was postponed, it seems obvious that the executor should retain possession until this charge is fully satisfied. As it does not appear that this time has yet arrived, I advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

MILLER v. BENSINGER. (No. 14,174.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1892.)

EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

In ejectment for a strip of land a few inches in width between adjoining lots, where it appeared that defendant had been for about 25 years in possession of the strip, which was by a survey included in his deed, when another survey was made, showing the strip to belong to plaintiff's lot, defendant's testimony that his occupancy was under a claim of right to hold the same adversely to plaintiff and the whole world is sufficient to support a finding for defendant as by prescription, though it also appeared that after the latter survey defendant offered to surrender the strip if plaintiff would pay the expense of moving the house which extended onto it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Ejectment by Sarah Miller against Daniel Bensinger. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Scrivner & Schell, for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action in ejectment for the recovery of a strip of land less than two feet in width, extending along the side of a lot occupied by the defendant. Judgment was given for the latter, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

It appears that the parties bought adjoining lots, under a certain survey. That about 25 years after the defendant took possession under his deed, occupied, fenced, and built upon what he supposed to be his lot of land, and which included that in controversy here, it appeared under a new survey for the city and county of San Francisco, where the land is situated, that he had in possession a lot of land wider by not quite two feet than his deed called for; and that the lot in possession of the plaintiff was 30 feet wide, less the same number of inches. Hence the plaintiff claimed that the defendant was by mistake in possession of a part of her lot, and sued for it.

The only question at issue, as we think, is whether the evidence supports the findings of fact in reference to the defense of the statute of limitations under sections 318, 319, Code Civil Proc., set up by defendant. There is no dispute that all the necessary ingredients of this defense exist, save that the appellant contends that the occupation of the defendant is not shown by the evidence to have been taken and held with the intention to do so adversely to the plaintiff and all the world. The plaintiff strenuously argues that the defendant only intended to occupy the number of feet in width of land that his deed called for, and that, when the survey showed that he had in possession more than this quantity, then he acknowledged that the land in controversy belonged to the plaintiff, by offering to give possession of it to her if she would pay for the removal of his house, which stood upon it. We do not think that the offer of defendant amounted to anything more than an exhibition of a willingness to buy his peace and avoid a lawsuit. Furlong v. Cooney, 72 Cal., at page 329, 14 Pac. Rep. 15. He was asked, among others, these questions, and made answers thereto as follows: "Question. Now, what was the nature of your occupation there? Was it in your own right? The Court: That is admitted. Mr. Scrivner: Yes. Q. In other words, you were holding adverse to all the world? The Court: In his own right, he was holding. Whatever possession he had was in his own right. Mr. Cooney: Adverse to the world, to everybody? Answer. Yes, sir. Mr. Scrivner: Adverse in one sense. Mr. Cooney: He claimed it. Mr. Scrivner: I don't admit that he claimed it. The Court: Whatever possession he had there was held for himself. Mr. Scrivner: Yes. Mr. Cooney: Adversely to everybody? A. Yes, (by witness.) Mr. Scrivner: Well, it is before the judge." It will be seen that the defendant himself said that he claimed adversely to the whole world, which showed an intention to hold adversely to the plaintiff. In the face of this statement, which the defendant nowhere else varies from on this point, we see no error on the part of the court below in believing and finding that the defendant held the land intentionally adversely to plaintiff and the whole world. The findings are supported by the evidence, and the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

I concur: VANCLIEF, C

In re HENSING'S ESTATE. (No. 14,943.)

ACCOUNTING BY TRUSTEE.

In a probate proceeding it appeared that by a decree of distribution made under a will Z. received, in trust for the grandchildren of testatrix, money to be paid when the eldest attained her majority. On the same date as the will the same testatrix conveyed to Z. a lot of land in trust for A., F., and O., grandchildren of testatrix, to be conveyed when the eldest became of age. There were living at date of will and conveyance, five grandchildren, — M., A., F., C., and A., but no O., as mentioned in the conveyance. After M., the eldest, attained her majority, Z. conveyed the lot held by him in trust to the four grandchildren mentioned in the deed of trust, including O., who never existed, and on the same day deposited in a bank in his own name, as trustee for the five grandchildren, a part of the money held by him in trust, as M., the eldest, desired Z. to retain her share, and the other children had no guardian. Subsequently Z. filed his account, charging himself 6 per cent. interest on the trust fund down to the time of deposit, and 7 per cent. on the amount retained by him after the deposit, and credited himself out of the whole fund with taxes paid, street assessments, and costs of conveyancing on the lot owned by only three of the grandchildren, and also credited himself with the amount in bank. Held, that Z. should be charged with the amount received by the decree of distribution, with interest at 7 per cent. until the deposit in the bank; after which time with the interest earned in the bank, and with the amount deposited in the bank. The amount paid by him for taxes, street assessments, and conveyancing should be credited him, and taken out of the shares, distributed to the three grandchildren who own the lot, and in whose interest these sums were expended.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge Proceeding by Manuel Eyre, guardian ad litem, against Herman Zwieg, trustee, in the settlement of the estate of Augusta Hensing, deceased. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Loughborough, for appellant Manuel Eyre, for appellee.

FOOTE, C. Under the terms of a will made by Augusta Hensing, dated August 14, 1876, a decree of distribution was made by the probate court of San Francisco, December 19, 1879, distributing the sum of $806.19 to Herman Zwieg, in trust to invest the same, and pay the income of the same to Anna Louise Hinden, the daughter of the testatrix, during the lifetime of one Valentine Hinden, the husband of Anna Louise Hinden, and upon the death of the husband to pay the principal of that sum to Anna Louise Hinden; but, in the event that she did not survive her husband, the money bequeathed in trust should be invested by the trustee, Zwieg, for the use and benefit of the surviving children of Anna Louise Hinden by her said husband, Valentine, and that the income, or so much thereof as should be necessary, should be expended for the support and education of the children until the oldest should attain the age of majority, and that then the money bequeathed, or so much thereof as should remain, should be equally divided between the children or such of them as might survive. At the same date as the will, the same testatrix conveyed a lot of ground to Zwieg, in trust for Margaret, Alfred, Minna, and Otto Hinden, grandchildren of the grantor in the deed, and upon trust to convey the same to them on the 25th of September, 1889; that being the day after the day when Margaret, the oldest of these grandchildren, should attain the age of majority. Anna Louise Hinden died in January, 1881, leaving her husband, Valentine Hinden, surviving, and five children, called Margaret, Alfred, Minna, Camille, and Alice, all of whom were born prior to the execution of the deed in trust and the making of the will. There never was any child named Otto Hinden, and therefore the deed in trust of the lot was for the benefit of the three children mentioned in it, viz., Margaret, Minna, and Alfred, leaving out Camille and Alice, as is claimed, by some mistake. The will mentioned none of the children by name, nor did the decree of distribution, so that under that decree the five children born before the making of the will, viz., Margaret, Alfred, Camille, Alice, and Minna, took equally of the fund distributed. Under the deed, however, only three of them had an interest in the lot, viz., Margaret, Alfred, and Minna. Zwieg, the trustee, the fund being small, and he acting in good faith, used the money himself, and paid the interest, at 6 per cent. per annum, to Mrs. Hinden as long as she lived, and afterwards expended a small part of the interest on the expenses of the children. He also paid taxes on the lot conveyed to him for the benefit of three of the children amounting to $49.70, and a street assessment amounting to $208.28, certain costs of conveyance, etc., amounting to $10, or thereabouts. Upon the 5th of October, 1889, he deposited a portion of the money—$1,100—in a savings bank of good repute, in his name, as trustee for all the five children, and on that day he executed a deed to the children, including Otto, who never existed, (the conveyancer following the terms of the deed from the original grantor in the deed in trust.) Thus the deed made vested the title to the lot in Margaret, Alfred, and Minna, leaving out Alice and Camille, of the five children interested in the fund included in the decree of distribution. According to the terms of both trusts, the trustee was required to pay over the money to the five children, and execute the conveyance to the three children, on the 25th of September, 1889. But it is claimed that Margaret, who was then of age, asked that he retain her share of the money, and the other children had no guardian. Zwieg was cited on the 15th of April, 1891, under section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, (St. 1889, p. 337,) by a petition of the minors, by Manuel Eyre, guardian ad litem, to appear and render an account. He filed his account, and charged himself interest on the fund in hand at 7 per cent. per annum, semiannually, and claimed no commissions or counsel fees. He claimed credit, as against the whole fund, for the taxes, assessments, and conveyancing fees, etc., in respect to the lot, which was, however, owned by only three of the children, and also for the amount in bank. The court sustained the objection to the disbursements for taxes, assessments, and costs of conveyance, etc., and gave no credit for the amount deposited in bank, and charged the appellant here, Zwieg, with the original sum of $806.19, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, compounding semiannually, to the date of the order in this cause, made August 14, 1891, we suppose because in his account the trustee had charged himself with interest at that rate, as being perhaps profit realized by him out of the money.

As we view the matter, the court, in allowing this account, should have charged Zwieg with the money received under the decree, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, with semiannual rests, under the rule he had prescribed for himself, up to the date when the $1,100 was put in a savings bank; for after that he was responsible for interest on that sum up to August 14, 1891, only to the amount earned from the bank, but he also remained responsible for the $1,100. Of course, the sums paid Mrs. Hinden in her lifetime, and for the children's expenses, should be deducted, as they were. But we do not think the trustee should be disallowed entirely the moneys he paid out for taxes, assessments, and conveyances respecting the lot of the three children. One third of these sums should be deducted from each of their shares of the money to be distributed to them, and not be a charge upon the portions of the other two children, not named in the deed to the lot. Therefore the trustee should receive credit for those sums as against the shares of the three children who own the lot, as he paid these sums out to protect their interests. For these reasons the decree made in the premises should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter a decree in accordance with the views here expressed, and we so advise.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the decree is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter a decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. LANE. (No. 20,969.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1892.)

Appeal in Criminal Cases—Stay.

Where a defendant, after sentence, takes an appeal therefrom, and makes application to the superior court for a certificate of probable cause to stay proceedings pending the appeal, but such application is denied, he may, under Pen. Code, § 1243, renew the application in the supreme court; and, since it cannot be heard there without the bill of exceptions in the case, it is the duty of the superior court, on application therefor, to grant a temporary stay during the time allowed by law for the settlement of the bill of exceptions, and during such further time as may be necessary for its settlement, provided the defendant exercises proper diligence.

In chambers.

Application by William R. Lane for a temporary stay of proceedings pending the settlement of a bill of exceptions by which to renew his application for a writ of probable cause before the supreme court, which writ the superior court has denied. Stay ordered.

C. A. Webb, for petitioner.

Beatty, C. J. The defendant in this case was convicted of the crime of murder, and on the 22d day of November, 1892, was sentenced to the state prison for life. After appealing to the supreme court, his counsel, on November 23d, for the purpose of staying proceedings pending the appeal, applied to the superior court for a certificate of probable cause. Pen. Code, § 1243. His application was denied. He then applied for a temporary stay of proceedings pending settlement of his bill of exceptions, in order that he might renew his application for a certificate of probable cause before a justice of this court. This was also refused, and he now applies here for such temporary stay. The defendant, being refused a certificate of probable cause by the judge of the superior court, has a clear, statutory right to renew his application here. Pen. Code, § 1243. Such application cannot be heard until the bill of exceptions is settled, (In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 Pac. Rep. 547,) and the defendant is entitled to 10 days after judgment, and such further time as the court may grant, for preparing and presenting a draft of his bill. At the time the application for a temporary stay was refused, the 10 days allowed by law had not elapsed, and the superior judge subsequently granted an extension of 60 days to settle the bill of exceptions. It was the plain duty of the superior court to stay the proceedings during the time allowed by law for preparing the bill of exceptions, and for such further time as might be necessary for its settlement, provided the defendant exercised proper diligence in its preparation. In re Adams, 81 Cal. 165, 22 Pac. Rep. 547. The 60 days' time granted by the court for the settlement of the bill certainly implies that the defendant is reasonably entitled to some extension of the statutory time for presenting his bill, and that 60 days is a reasonable time for its settlement. If so, it is difficult to perceive upon what theory the temporary stay was denied. It is ordered that proceedings against defendant be stayed pending the settlement of the bill of exceptions and his application here for a certificate of probable cause. As it does not appear that the superior court has made any definite order fixing a time within which the defendant must prepare a draft of a bill, that matter is remitted to its discretion, with leave to the people to set aside this order if the defendant does not present his bill in time.

PILSTER v. HIGHTON. (No. 14,510.)

Action on Note—Pleading.

A complaint on a note alleging its date and execution, and promise to pay 90 days therefrom by defendant maker, and a transfer by indorsement to plaintiff, and nonpayment by defendant, states a sufficient cause of action.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Henry Pilster against Henry E. Highton. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the complaint referred to in the opinion: "The plaintiff complains, and alleges: (1) That on the 1st day of March, 1890, at San Francisco, state of California, the defendant, by his promissory note, promised to pay to Otto Kloppenburg or order $330.45, with interest, ninety days after date; (2) that the same was, by the indorsement of the said Otto Kloppenburg, transferred to the plaintiff; (3) that the defendant has not paid the same nor any part thereof. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against defendant for the sum of $330.45, with interest from March 1, 1890, and for the costs of this action. W. W. McNair, Attorney for plaintiff." Indorsed: "Filed February 7, 1891. Wm. J. Blattner, Clerk. By J. J. Grief, Deputy Clerk."

Walter H. Linforth, for appellant. W. W. McNair, for respondent.

Per Curiam. This is an action upon a promissory note. The complaint was demurred to upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and was ambiguous and uncertain. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant given 10 days to answer. He declined to answer, and thereupon judgment was entered against him, from which he appeals. The complaint was inartistically drawn, but we think it must be held sufficient. Judgment affirmed.

VULCAN POWDER CO. v. HERCULES POWDER CO. et al. (No. 13,079.)

CONTRACTS—RESTRAINT OF TRADE—PATENT RIGHTS.

1. A contract between several companies, under which it is agreed not to sell goods within certain territorial limits for a specified time, and that no company shall sell more than a certain per cent. of the whole amount sold by all the companies, is void, under Civil Code, §§ 1673-1675, which provide that every contract, by which one is restrained from exercising a business or calling, is void to that extent, except that one who has sold the good will of a business may agree not to carry on a similar business within a specified county or town, and that, in anticipation of dissolution of a partnership, a partner may agree not to carry on a similar business in the town or city where the partnership was located.

2. The fact that such contract provides for the interchange of the use of certain patents owned by some of the companies does not take it out of the statute.

3. The contract being illegal, one of the parties thereto cannot enforce against the others provisions under it which are the means of insuring its success.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action on a contract by the Vulcan Powder Company against the Hercules Powder Company and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Roche, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondents.

McFarland, J. On June 2, 1884, a written contract was entered into by and between the Giant Powder Company, party of the first part, the California Powder Works, party of the second part, and the Safety Nitro Powder Company, the Vulcan Powder Company, and the California Vigorit Powder Company, parties of the third part, all corporations existing under the laws of this state. The contract was about the manufacture and sale of nitroglycerine powders called "dynamite." This action was brought by the said Vulcan Powder Company, one of said parties of the third part, against all of the other parties to enforce certain parts of said contract. The defendant the California Powder Works demurred to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that the contract was in restraint of trade, and therefore against public policy and void. The demurrer was sustained by the trial court, and judgment rendered in favor of said defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

At common law, originally, all contracts which in any degree tended to the restraint of trade were void; but afterwards the rule was relaxed so as to countenance contracts for the partial restraint of trade,—that is, contracts in which the restraint was confined to reasonable limits of time or place, and which were founded upon sufficient consideration, etc. Quite a full statement of the rule at common law is to be found in Wright v. Ryder, 36 Cal. 356. The rule, however, was uncertain, and led to much perplexing legislation; and the law upon the subject in this state is now declared in section 1673 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows: "Every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, otherwise than is provided by the next two sections, is to that extent void." The next two sections merely provide that one who sells the good will of a business may agree not to carry on a similar business within a specified county or city; and that, in anticipation of a dissolution of a partnership, a partner may agree not to carry on a similar business within the city or town where the partnership business is transacted. Neither of these two exceptions applies to the case at bar; and, if the contract here sued on is obnoxious to said section 1673, then the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Passing for the present a point of appellant based upon certain patent rights, it is clear that the contract is in restraint of trade and void. It is quite long, but, for the purposes of the question now before us, it is necessary to notice only some of its provisions. The contract, which is for a term of three years, provides that neither of the parties thereto shall make any shipment of dynamite to any part of the United States lying east of the eastern boundaries of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico. With respect to the territories lying west of said boundaries, it provides that "except under the provisions of this instrument, none of the parties hereto shall be or become interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture or sale of dynamite powder." It provides that each party shall sell only a certain per cent. "of the aggregate quantity of dynamite sold by all the parties hereto," the per cent. to be sold by some of the parties being larger than that allowed to be sold by others; and that, "when any party shall exceed the said proportion, the party selling the excess, as ascertained by the quarterly statement hereinafter more particularly referred to, shall pay over to the other parties the profits on such excess." It provides that the profits on such excess shall be ascertained by a standing committee, to whom each party shall make quarterly reports, by computing the difference between the "manufacturing cost" of such excess—said cost to be fixed by said committee—and the average price realized by all the parties. It provides that said standing committee "shall have power to fix the prices at which dynamite shall be sold in the states and territories embraced within the agreement;" and that "these prices shall be known as the 'selling prices;' and upon them all the parties hereto shall be required to settle with the standing committee." It provides that the prices and the "manufacturing cost" may be "changed at the discretion of the standing committee;" that each party shall account to said committee for all dynamite sold; and that said committee may impose fines on any party violating the contract, and may exercise other powers not necessary to be here mentioned; and it provides that the contract may be terminated at any time if "other party or parties shall begin the manufacturing and selling dynamite within the territory named in competition to the parties hereto." The above-stated provisions of the contract are clearly in restraint of trade and against public policy; and this conclusion is too obvious to need argument, authorities, or elucidation.

2. Appellant contends that the principle that contracts in restraint of trade are void does not apply to the contract here sued on, because it deals with certain patent rights. The facts on which this point is based are these: It appears from the contract that three of the contracting parties were the owners of certain letters patent for invention of methods or processes for making dynamite. The other two parties, viz., the plaintiff herein and the Vigorit Powder Company, did not have any such patent. There is a good deal of recitation in the contract about these patents, and mention is made of an "interchange of rights" under them. It is recited that the parties are desirous of being released from all claims for any infringement, "real or alleged," of said patents, and of obtaining license from each other to manufacture under said patents; and "in consideration of the premises, and of certain valuable considerations," (not stated,) they enter into the contract. As the plaintiff and the Vigorit Company had no patent, it is obvious that the consideration moving from them was their covenant to refrain from competition in the dynamite business, and that they had no patent rights to "interchange." In some text-books and decisions it has been stated, generally, that the rule about contracts in restraint of trade being void does not apply to patent rights; but, as applied in the adjudicated cases, it means only that a trader may sell a patent right, or a secret in his trade or art, and restrain himself generally from the use of it, or from other acts which would lessen the value of the patent sold. And, of course, as a patent is a sort of monopoly, the owner may manufacture under it or not, as he pleases; and may make either a partial or entire assignment of it; and may protect his assignee, not only by an agreement not to use the patent, (which would be unnecessary, because such use would be an infringement,) but by a covenant not to interfere in any way with the profits to be derived from the assigned patent. The cases cited by appellant (Twist, etc., Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73; Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 370; Stearns v. Barrett, 11 Amer. Dec. 227; Mackinnon P. Co. v. Fountain Ink Co., 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. 447; Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118) go no further than this. Indeed, most of those cases go upon the old rule that there may be a contract in partial restraint of trade, independent of the right of the patentee, and upon the principle applied in said section 1673 of our Civil Code to the sale of the good will of a business. But no case has been cited in which it has been held that several persons or companies can legally enter into a business combination to control the manufacture or sale or price of a staple of commerce merely because some of the contracting parties have letters patent for certain grades of that staple. Indeed, the contract before us is not confined to dynamite produced under the processes of the named patents. It speaks in places of "dynamite" generally, and provides that the contract may be terminated if "other party or parties shall begin the business of manufacturing and selling dynamite within the territory named, in competition to the parties hereto;" thus recognizing the probability of other persons, not having the patents named, entering into the business of making and selling the very commodity that is the subject of the contract.

3. Appellant contends that, even though the contract be void, still this action can be maintained. The contract provides that each of the parties shall make periodical verified reports of the amount of dynamite sold by it to the standing committee, and that each party shall have the right to make quarterly examinations of the books of account, papers, and vouchers of each of the other parties; and the gist of the complaint is that the defendants have made false reports of the amount of dynamite sold by them, and refuse to allow an examination of the books, etc. The object of the action is to compel defendants to allow such examination of their books and papers, and for a judgment against them for such amount of money as may be found to be due from them to plaintiff according to the provisions of the contract. The rule upon the subject is expressed in the maxim, ex turpi causa non oritur actio,—no cause of action can arise out of an illegal contract,—and a court will leave the parties to such a contract exactly where it finds them. Courts have held in a few instances—against the current of authority—that, where money or other property has accumulated under an illegal contract, equity will not refuse to dispose of such property as between the parties. Appellant has cited some of such decisions. But in the case at bar the provisions sought to be enforced by the action are the very means established by the parties to the contract for the purpose of making sure their illegal agreements. They are inseparably interwoven with the whole texture of the contract, and partake of its general character. To grant the prayer of the complaint would be to put into operation the only machinery by which one of the parties to the contract could enforce it against the others. They must be left where they are.

ACHESON v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. (No. 14,526.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1892.)

CONTRACT—PLEADING—CONSIDERATION—NOMINAL DAMAGE.

1. The consideration on which a contract, not in writing, is based, must be pleaded.

2. A complaint, alleging mistake in the transmission of a telegram, so that plaintiffs were prevented from buying certain goods, and asking a certain sum as special damage, without alleging any facts going to show such damage, will sustain a judgment only for nominal damages.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Robert Acheson against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover for mistake in the transmission of a message. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Carpenter, for appellant. A. Heynemann, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from a judgment entered by the clerk upon default. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was overruled, and the default was entered for want of an answer. The sole question is whether the complaint is sufficient to sustain the judgment. The complaint in the first paragraph alleged the incorporation of defendant, "and that said corporation is, and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned, engaged in the business of telegraphing for hire." The second paragraph alleged the partnership of Philip Wolf & Co. The third paragraph contained the following allegations: "That on the 20th day of December, 1889, the said firm of Philip Wolf & Co. presented to the defendant at its office in San Francisco, state of California, and said defendant undertook to forward the same, a message of the following tenor," etc.; setting out that and several other messages between said firm and their agent at Independence and other places in Oregon, relating to the purchase of hops, though that did not appear in any of the telegrams. The message upon which this action is based was sent by Berheim (the agent) from Independence, Or., December 23, 1889, to said firm at San Francisco, and, as written, was as follows: "Have refusal Hill lot eight hours tannery taciturn answer Portland." As transmitted, the word "hours" was converted into the word "hows." The cypher word "tannery" means "eight" and "taciturn" means "one half." The fifth paragraph is as follows: "That, by reason of the gross carelessness and negligence of the defendant in so forwarding the telegram containing the error of 'hows' for 'hours,' the said Messrs. Philip Wolf & Co. were prevented from buying and purchasing a lot of hops, consisting of 152 bales, averaging 180 pounds per bale, at eight and one half cents per pound, and amounting to $2,325.60; and that by reason of the gross carelessness and negligence of said defendant the said Philip Wolf & Co. were damaged in the sum of six hundred and eighty-four dollars." Wolf & Co., after presenting their claim to defendant, assigned it to plaintiff.

1. The demurrer should have been sustained. No consideration is alleged for the defendant's undertaking to transmit the message. "Contracts, to be valid, must be formed upon a consideration, and, except as to those that import it, the consideration must be proved, and consequently should be stated." Bliss, Code Pl. § 268. The exceptions at common law were contracts under seal, and, under the statute, all contracts in writing. The agreement to forward the message in question is not alleged to have been in writing, and therefore a consideration should have been alleged.

2. The judgment is for the full amount prayed for, and the averments of the complaint do not sustain such a judgment. The gist of the action is for the recovery of special damages, and there is no allegation of special damage. Nominal damages only were recoverable on the complaint. If plaintiff suffered special damage by the failure to purchase certain hops, there should have been averments under which evidence of such special damage, and the facts upon which it rested, could have been introduced. No damage, unless nominal, necessarily resulted from the alleged breach of contract. There is nothing to show that plaintiff suffered any loss, because he did not buy the hops at the named price. He may have saved money by not making the purchase. Of course, this attack on the judgment by appeal is direct, and not collateral. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint, if so advised.

In re MOORE'S ESTATE. (No. 14,966.)

ACCOUNTING BY ADMINISTRATOR — NEGLIGENCE—COMMISSIONS—ADVANCEMENTS TO WIDOW—SETTING APART HOMESTEAD.

1. A ranch belonging to an administrator's intestate was leased to B. for a year, and the cows were pastured during the winter on a farm belonging to the administrator, B. agreeing to pay $300 therefor,—one half to the administrator and one half to his tenant. B. failed to make the payment, and the administrator advanced to his tenant the amount due him for the pasturage. Held, that this amount should not have been allowed to the administrator as a credit in the settlement of his account.

2. The court below found that the reasonable rent for a ranch in 1888 was $100 a month; that the administrator failed to collect the rent for four months; that he could have rented the ranch one year for $400 more than he received; also that he failed to collect the interest on a certain note by not pushing the collection until the maker became insolvent; and, therefore, that he should be charged with these respective amounts. Held, that the administrator was improperly charged with these amounts in the absence of any finding that the failure to collect them was due to lack of ordinary diligence in the management of the estate.

3. During one year the ranch was leased for $1,800, but, though there was evidence that $1,650 of this was paid to the administrator, yet he was charged with only $677.85 on account thereof. Held, that he should have been charged with the full amount received, and the fact that no specific exception was taken to this item was not a waiver of the right of the heirs to have it corrected, if afterwards found to be erroneous.

4. Commissions in excess of the statutory percentage cannot be allowed an administrator under Code Civil Proc. § 1618, providing that in fixing commissions the court may make such further allowance as it may deem just and reasonable, unless a petition is made for an extra allowance, or the court finds as a fact that extraordinary service has been rendered, for which there should be such extra compensation.

5. Where an administrator advances a sum of money to the widow of his intestate out of the funds of the estate, he may be reimbursed for such amount, on the settlement of his accounts, from the distributive share due such widow, whether it consists of money or real estate.

6. A number of years after intestate's death his widow asked that a homestead be set apart, which was done, the order setting it aside giving the widow an undivided one half thereof, and three children an undivided one sixth each. The land thus set apart was the separate property of the intestate. Held that, if the court erred in setting apart any portion absolutely to the widow, the order was not void, and, since no appeal was ever taken therefrom, the title to the homestead is, as against the heirs of the intestate, in the persons named in the decree, and therefore such land cannot be distributed in the settlement of the estate. Paterson, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

Proceedings for the settlement of the accounts of Thomas W. Moore, administrator of William H. Moore, deceased, and for the distribution of the estate. From the order settling the accounts, and from the decree of distribution, all the parties affected appeal. Reversed.

A. S. Kittredge, Chas. B. Younger, Warren Olney, and Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellants. Frank M. Stone, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. William H. Moore died intestate in Santa Cruz county in 1871, leaving a widow, Helen M. Moore, and five children. In March, 1872, Thomas W. Moore, a brother of the deceased, was appointed administrator of his estate, and on July 27, 1891, an order and decree were made settling the final account of the administrator, and also making a final distribution of the estate. All of the parties affected by this order and decree appeal.

1. In the year 1877 the "Moore ranch," belonging to the estate of the deceased, together with the cows thereon, was leased to one Bradley. The season was very dry, and the ranch did not produce feed enough to keep the cows during the ensuing winter, and they were pastured on a farm belonging to the administrator, Bradley agreeing to pay $300 therefor, one half of which would belong to the administrator, and the balance to his tenant. It seems that Bradley failed to make the payment, and the administrator advanced to his tenant the portion to which he was entitled for the pasturage of the cows, and the court allowed this payment to the administrator as a credit in the settlement of his account. In so doing the court erred. The cows were pastured for Bradley, and not for the estate; and the administrator, in paying his tenant, advanced the amount paid for the benefit of Bradley, and is not entitled to look to the estate for its repayment.

2. The court also found: "The reasonable rent for said Moore ranch belonging to said estate during the year 1888 was $100 per month. Said administrator failed to collect the rent of the said ranch from May 1st to September 1st of said year, to wit, for four months, and will therefore be charged the sum of $400 in his said account. The said administrator could have rented the said ranch for $400 more than he received from Fred. W. Moore in the year 1879–80, and he will therefore be charged with that amount. At the time of the death of said deceased he owned the note of one Rodriguez for $1,000. The administrator collected the principal of said note, but did not collect the interest thereon, amounting to the sum of $202.50, for the reason that he did not push the collection thereof until after the said Rodriguez became insolvent. He will therefore be charged with said amount of $202.50, making a total charged to him under this article of $1,202.50." The facts as thus found did not warrant the court in charging the administrator with either of the items referred to in the finding. It is not found that the failure to collect the rent of the Moore ranch for the period named, or the failure to lease the same for a larger rent, was due to the neglect of the administrator to use ordinary care and diligence in the management of the business of the estate, or that he did not act in good faith, and for what he deemed for the best interest of the estate; and, in the absence of such a finding, the administrator should not have been charged with these sums. This results from the well-settled rule that the only measure of an administrator's duty is to act with fidelity, and with that degree of prudence and diligence which a man of ordinary judgment would be expected to bestow upon his own affairs of a like nature. So, too, in regard to the Rodriguez note. There is no finding that the balance due upon this note was lost by the negligence of the administrator. The failure to "push the collection of the note" may have been negligence, but it is not necessarily so. It frequently happens that indulgence to a debtor is a matter of prudence on the part of the creditor, and the court does not find as a fact that the administrator in this instance failed to exercise a reasonable judgment in failing to enforce the collection of the note by process of law. It is true that when an administrator receives a note, and the maker thereof is solvent, but afterwards becomes insolvent, the burden of proof is on him to show that with due diligence he could not have collected it. Williams v. Petticrew, 62 Mo. 460. But, while this is the rule as to the burden of proof, it does not help the finding of the court under consideration. The defect in the finding is that it fails to pass upon the question whether the administrator was guilty or free from negligence.

3. It appears that during one year the "Moore ranch" was leased to one Frederick Moore for $1,800, of which sum $1,650 was paid to the administrator. There is evidence tending to show that this amount was paid to the administrator, and our attention has not been called to any evidence in conflict therewith, and yet the administrator is only charged with $677.85 on account thereof. He should have been charged with the full amount he received, as shown by the evidence. The fact that no specific exception was taken to this item of the account, and that the attention of the court below was not called to the evidence showing that the administrator had not charged himself with the full amount which he received from this source, while it suggests a reason for the failure of the court below to detect the error in the account of the administrator as filed, is still not a waiver of the right of those entitled to succeed to the estate to have the same corrected if it should appear to be such, in the course of the further proceedings to be had in the settlement of his account.

4. The court allowed the administrator $5,765.33 as commissions. This sum is in excess of the statutory percentage to which he would have been entitled as a matter of course, calculated upon the whole amount of the estate which he accounted for; and, in so far as it exceeds the percentage fixed by the statute, is erroneous. We do not overlook the fact that, in addition to the fixed commissions allowed to the administrator by law, the court is authorized to make such further allowance as it "may deem just and reasonable for any extraordinary service." Code Civil Proc. § 1618. But the administrator did not petition the court below for such extra allowance, and the court did not find as a fact that he rendered any extraordinary service for which he should receive such extra compensation.

5. The court below found that the sum of $6,000 was paid and advanced by the administrator "in good faith from the funds of the estate to Helen M. Moore, the widow of said deceased, who received the same with the knowledge that said money was a part of the funds of said estate," and as a conclusion of law therefrom the court held that the administrator should not be allowed credit for said sum in his account with the estate, but that he should be charged interest thereon from the date of its payment, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and that the said sum of $6,000 "should be deemed and treated as an advancement out of the funds of said estate to said widow, Helen M. Moore, as a distributee of the estate of said deceased," and that she should be charged with interest thereon from the date of its payment at 7 per cent. per annum; and that the said sum of $6,000, with the interest thereon, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $11,959.60, should be credited to the administrator "upon distribution of said estate as against any interest or distributive share said Helen M. Moore may have in said estate, and the amount thereof" should be paid by her to said administrator, "and he is entitled * * * to retain her distributive share of any moneys of said estate as part payment thereof," and that, as to any balance that may remain unpaid after the application of the share of said Helen M. Moore in the moneys in the hands of the administrator subject to distribution, the court "as a probate court has no power to declare a lien therefor upon the distributive share of Helen M. Moore in the real and personal property of said estate." The decree of distribution was in accordance with this finding of the court and its conclusion of law, and both the widow and the administrator appeal therefrom. The widow, Helen M. Moore, contends that the finding of the court that she was paid the sum referred to out of the funds of the estate, as an advancement to her, is against the evidence, and that the court erred in charging the same against her distributive share of the moneys of the estate. She does not deny that she received the money, but she insists that it was paid to her as the result of a personal transaction between herself and the administrator, and over which the probate court has no jurisdiction in this proceeding. It is unnecessary to go into any extended discussion of the evidence. It is sufficient for us to say that, in our judgment, it was such as to fully support the finding of the court that the sum of $6,000 was paid to the widow out of the funds of the estate, and that she received the same knowing that it was paid to her by the administrator upon the understanding and agreement that she was to accept it as her share of the estate. It makes no difference that the agreement upon which she received the money was not such as to be legally binding upon her, and that she has since successfully repudiated it. She has retained the money, and upon the most obvious principles of justice this fact must be taken into account in the final distribution of the estate. In settling the accounts of the administrator, and in ascertaining the distributive shares of those entitled to succeed to the estate of a deceased person, and in adjudging what shall satisfy the decree of distribution, the superior court, in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction, proceeds upon principles of equity, and may so frame its judgments as to do exact justice in regard to all matters properly entering into the account of the administrator, and which in the application of equitable rules affect the distributive shares of the estate. In Re Niles, 113 N. Y. 547, 21 N. E. Rep. 687, the court say: "This matter of the administration of assets of the estate is peculiarly within the cognizance of equity and a surrogate's court, in adjusting the accounts of executors or administrators, is governed by principles of equity as well as law. Upson v. Badeau, 3 Bradf. Sur. 15. In the exercise of the statutory powers conferred upon him to direct and control the conduct and settle the accounts of administrators and executors, the surrogate is not fettered, nor is he prevented by any rule of law from doing exact justice to the parties. He is supposed to administer justice in each case within his jurisdiction, according as the equities of the case demand, within the confines only of statutory provisions." In accordance with this principle it was held in the case of Hyland v. Baxter, 98 N. Y. 610, that the surrogate's court had jurisdiction in the settlement of an administrator's account to allow, as against the distributive shares of minors, moneys which had been advanced by the administrator for their maintenance, without any previous order of the court. In that case the court said: "It is true that an administrator in making advances acts without authority, and at his peril, but this is true in every case where a parent, or one in loco parentis, or a trustee or guardian, makes advances not previously sanctioned by the court, or by the instrument creating the trust, and comes to the court for relief. The fact that the question is an equitable one, and depends upon equitable principles, is not a ground of objection to the jurisdiction. The surrogate's court is a court of limited powers and jurisdiction, but it has jurisdiction to determine questions, either legal or equitable, arising in the course of proceedings in the execution of powers expressly conferred, and which must be decided therein." And in 2 Woerner on the Law of Administration, (section 519,) after stating that distributive shares of minors should be charged with the money advanced for their support by the executor or administrator, it is said: "The same rule holds good in respect of payments to adult distributees and legatees. The accountant is entitled to credit against these to the full extent of payments made to them, whether ordered by the court or not." We have no doubt that this is the correct rule, and that, when advances have been made by an administrator out of the funds of the estate to one entitled to share in its distribution, the probate court, exercising the broad equitable powers which are conferred upon it as incident to its jurisdiction to settle the accounts of administrators and to distribute estates administered upon, may allow the administrator to reimburse himself from the distributive share of the person to whom such advancement was made. It follows from what has been said that the court did not err in ascertaining the amount already paid by the administrator to the widow from the funds of the estate, and in decreeing that he might reimburse himself to the extent of her share of the moneys of the estate in his hands.

6. The superior court, as we have seen, held that the amount of cash distributed to the widow might be applied by the administrator upon the amount found by the court to be due him on account of the advances made by him, but as to the balance due, after applying this money in his hands, the court held that it had no power to give him any relief. We think that in so holding the court was in error. The administrator was entitled to a decree that the amount advanced by him to the widow was a charge against her entire distributive share of the estate, whether the same consisted of money or real estate or both. If her share of the money of said estate distributed was not sufficient to pay such advances, the court should have made the distribution of her share of the real estate as subject to the payment of the amount found to be due from her to the administrator by the decree. The court had the right to so decree, as incident to its general power to state the account between the parties in accordance with justice and equity, and in the settlement of which account on such a basis the court would necessarily have to ascertain what the widow had already received from the administrator on account of her distributive share of the estate.

7. In August, 1877, the widow applied for a homestead to be set apart to her from the estate, and on April 26, 1881, the court made an order setting aside as a homestead 35 acres of land, with the dwelling house and improvements thereon, "the undivided one half thereof to said widow," and an undivided one sixth to each of three children named. The land thus set apart as a homestead was the separate property of the deceased; and, if it should be conceded that the court erred in setting apart any portion of it absolutely to the widow, still it was only an error committed in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and the order was not void. No appeal was ever taken from this order, and it is now in full force. This being so, the court erred in distributing, as part of the estate, the land so set apart as a homestead. By force of the decree setting it aside the title to the homestead is, as against the heirs of the deceased, in the parties named in that decree.

There are many other assignments of error, but to notice them would unnecessarily extend the length of this opinion. It is all-sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that, except in the particulars above pointed out, we find no error in rulings of the court. The decree settling the amount of the administrator and distributing the estate is reversed, and the court below is directed to find the facts in relation to the matters discussed in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the foregoing opinion, and thereupon settle the account of the administrator and make distribution of the estate in accordance with the views above expressed. The administrator should be allowed a reasonable sum on account of attorneys' fees incurred by him on this appeal. It was proper to charge the administrator with interest upon the sum advanced by him to the widow, and he is entitled to charge the amount of such interest against the portion of the estate to be distributed to her. The order and decree appealed from are reversed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Harrison, J.

Paterson, J., (concurring.) I concur in the order reversing the judgment, and agree to every proposition stated by Mr. Justice De Haven except the one relating to the homestead. I am of opinion that, it being conceded that the property out of which it was carved was separate property of deceased, the court could not—had no power to—set aside a homestead in fee. That, the fact being admitted, and shown by the record, no appeal from the order was necessary. The court can now say, and should say on final distribution, that the homestead was set apart only for a limited period. That, the time for distribution having arrived, the land must be treated as part of the estate.

OBERSTELLER v. COMMERCIAL ASSUR. CO. (No. 14,735.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1892.)

Insurance—Condition in Policy—Fraud on Part of Insured.

Plaintiff held a policy of insurance on certain property, which was destroyed by fire. The policy provided that it should be void "in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after the loss." After the fire, and prior to an action on the policy, plaintiff presented a proof of loss, subscribed and sworn to, claiming a loss of $1,845.75; and at the trial he testified that the value of the property lost was $2,000. Held, that the fact that the jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for only $500 is not conclusively a finding of fraud on his part, and does not authorize a judgment for defendant on the verdict.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Obersteller against the Commercial Assurance Company to obtain the amount of a policy of insurance on property destroyed by fire. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haggin & Van Ness, for appellant. Horace W. Philbrook and Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

Sharpstein, J. This appeal is from a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the defendant in an action upon a policy of insurance issued by defendant to plaintiff against loss or damage by fire of certain property, to wit: $600 on household furniture, useful and ornamental; $400 on pictures, paintings, and fire screens; and $200 on wearing apparel of self and family,—an amount not exceeding $1,200. One provision of the policy is that it shall be void "in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after loss." Defendant, in his answer, denied that plaintiff on his part performed all the conditions of said policy, and, further answering, alleged that subsequent to the fire, and prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff presented to defendant a written statement, subscribed and sworn to, in which he asserted that the damage by the fire to the property insured was $1,845.75, and thereupon demanded payment of the sum of $1,200, the full amount for which said property was insured by defendant; and defendant alleged that said statement was false and fraudulent, in that the damage to said property by said fire did not exceed the sum of $350. On the trial the plaintiff, in his own behalf, testified that the property insured and lost by the fire was of the value of $2,000. Defendant introduced evidence which tended to prove that the value thereof did not exceed $350. The court instructed the jury that if they should render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, then they should find upon the following particular questions of fact: "First. At the time of the fire in the complaint alleged, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the furniture in said Chenery street house? Second. At the time of the fire alleged in the complaint, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the pictures, paintings, and fire screens in said Chenery street house? Third. At the time of the fire in the complaint alleged, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the wearing apparel in said Chenery street house?" The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500. In addition to the general verdict the jury answered the interrogatories propounded to them, as above stated, as follows: "First. At the time of the fire in the complaint alleged, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the household furniture in said Chenery street house? Answer. $250. Second. At the time of the fire in the complaint alleged, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the pictures, paintings, and fire screens in said Chenery street house? Answer. $150. Third. At the time of the fire in the complaint alleged, to wit, the fire in the Chenery street house, what was the cash market value of the wearing apparel in the Chenery street house? Answer. $100." Immediately upon the entry of the general and special verdicts of the jury, defendant moved the court for judgment for defendant, on the ground that the verdict conclusively finds fraud upon the part of plaintiff, which was not granted, and judgment was entered for the sum of $500.

The Code provides: "When a special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court must give judgment accordingly." Code Civil Proc. § 625. This proceeding is not authorized in any other case, and the general and special verdicts in this case are entirely consistent. The special verdict finds the total value of the property insured and destroyed to be the sum of $500, and the general verdict is for that sum. If, in their special verdict, the jury had found the value of the property to be less than $500, and had rendered a general verdict for that or a greater sum, it would as clearly be within the provision above quoted as it now as clearly is not. All that can now be said is that the jury found that plaintiff's loss was not so great as he represented it to be. That was favorable to the defendant. We think that finding was not conclusively a finding of fraud on the part of the plaintiff. Standing alone, it shows that he overestimated his property. Whether or not that vitiated the policy of insurance was a question not involved in the motion for judgment for the defendant upon the verdict. That motion, as we have before stated, could not be granted on any other ground than the one specified in the Code, viz., inconsistency between the general and special verdicts. The motion was properly denied. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: De Haven, J.; McFarland, J.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY LAND & WATER CO. v. WITMER BROS. CO. (No. 14,324.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

Rights of Mortgagors—Taxes on Mortgagee's Interest—Payment.

1. In an action to recover taxes assessed to defendant on its mortgage interest, but which plaintiff, as owner, paid to prevent becoming delinquent, the validity of the tax was questioned on the ground that the description of the mortgaged land varied from that contained in the mortgage. The mortgage, dated March 8, 1887, described the land according to the government survey. The land had afterwards been divided by plaintiff into blocks and town lots, and the subsequent assessment described the land as such blocks and lots. It was agreed that the land assessed constituted the identical land described in the mortgage, and no more, and that the assessment was in substantial conformity with the statute, and in proper form for the assessment of a mortgage interest in town lots. Held, that the description was sufficient. 29 Pac. Rep. 500, affirmed.

2. Pol. Code, § 3627, which gives the owner of the property the privilege of deducting the amount of the taxes so paid from the mortgage, is permissive, and not mandatory, and does not prohibit an action to recover the same. Beatty, C. J., and Harrison and Paterson, JJ., dissenting. 29 Pac. Rep. 500, affirmed.

3. Under Pol. Code, §§ 3627, 3628, which required the mortgage to be assessed to the person who owned it on the first Monday of March, where defendant owned the mortgage on that day, the subsequent assignment thereof did not relieve defendant of its liability for the payment of the taxes. Beatty, C. J., and Harrison and Paterson, JJ., dissenting. 29 Pac. Rep. 500, affirmed.

4. Pol. Code, §§ 1837, 2654, required road taxes and special school taxes to be levied by the supervisors, and to appear on the assessment book, and section 3789 made such book prima facie evidence of the assessment, and of the amount of unpaid taxes, and of the fact that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy had been complied with. Held, that where the assessment book, in due form, was in evidence, and there was no evidence tending to overcome such prima facie evidence, there was sufficient proof of the validity of such road and school taxes. 29 Pac. Rep. 500, affirmed.

On rehearing. Affirmed.

Per Curiam. After further consideration, we adhere to the opinion heretofore prepared by Commissioner Vanclief, and adopted by the court at the former hearing, (29 Pac. Rep. 500,) and for the reasons stated in that opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Harrison, J. I dissent upon the reasons stated by me at the former decision of the case.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent. The case turns altogether upon the meaning of section 4, art. 13, of the constitution, which reads as follows: "Sec. 4. A mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. Except as to railroad and other quasi corporations, in case of debts so secured, the value of the property affected by such mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or obligation, less the value of such security, shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of the property, and the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof, in the county, city, or district in which the property affected is situated. The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security. If paid by the owner of the security, the tax so levied upon the property affected thereby shall become a part of the debt so secured; if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and, to the extent of such payment, a full discharge thereof: provided, that, if any such security or indebtedness shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors, after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy for the preceding year." This section of the constitution not only defines the reciprocal rights and obligations of mortgagor and mortgagee with respect to the payment of the taxes assessed or assessable against their respective interests in the mortgaged premises, but was evidently intended to provide a simple and effective remedy for their enforcement. As security for the collection of the whole tax on both interests, the state reserves to itself a first lien upon the land,—a lien superior to the mortgage lien. To secure the mortgagee for taxes paid on the mortgagor's interest, the effect of these provisions is a virtual transfer to him of the claim and lien of the state by tacking it to the mortgage. But, the whole section being intended mainly for the benefit of the mortgagor, we find, as we should naturally expect to find, that especial pains have been taken to secure the enforcement of his right. His land being subjected to a lien in favor of the state, not only for the tax which it is his duty to pay, but also for the tax which it is the duty of the mortgagee to pay, he must, for his own protection, see that both are discharged. It is therefore provided that he may pay the tax on the mortgagee's interest, and that such payment shall count as a payment on, and as a full discharge pro tanto of, the mortgage debt. This is an ample and perfect remedy and protection to the mortgagor when he desires to pay off his mortgage at any time after the accrued taxes have become payable. He has only to pay the tax assessed to the mortgagee, and deduct the sum so paid from the amount of his debt. But there was another case to be provided for. It was foreseen that payment of mortgages would frequently be made after the taxes had accrued and become a lien, and before they were payable, or their amount ascertained by the order establishing the rate and making the levy. The taxes for each fiscal year accrue on the first Monday of March, preceding, (Const. art. 13, § 8,) and, when assessed, take effect and become a lien from that date, (Pol. Code, § 3718;) but, the rate to be levied being dependent upon the amount of the assessment, the levy cannot be made until assessments have been equalized, and the roll completed. The statute accordingly designates the first Monday of October as the date for making the levy. Pol. Code, § 3714. In other words, there is an interval of at least seven months in each year, as the law stands, after the mortgagee's tax has accrued, and before it is payable. And this case, as I have said, was foreseen by the framers of the constitution, and express provision made in the last clause of the section above quoted for the protection of the mortgagor who pays off his mortgage during such interval. Without this provision, he would, no doubt, have had another remedy in case of neglect by the mortgagee to pay the tax assessed upon the security; that is, he could have paid the tax himself, and have recovered it back in an action against the mortgagee for money paid. The authorities cited in the commissioner's opinion fully sustain this proposition. But this remedy would always be expensive and vexatious, and often ineffectual, by reason of the insolvency of the mortgagee, and therefore the constitution gave a simpler, an entirely inexpensive, and perfectly efficacious, remedy, by allowing the mortgagor in such case to retain out of the amount due on the mortgage the amount of the accrued taxes, computed according to the tax levy of the previous year.

The question is whether this remedy is exclusive; whether, in other words, the new remedy so given has the effect of abrogating the remedy which the law would have afforded in the absence of any such constitutional or statutory provision; and this, in my opinion, depends upon whether the change of remedy also involves a change of right. If a remedy exists for the enforcement of a right, the provision of a new remedy for the enforcement of the same right by a statute permissive in its terms does not abrogate the existing remedy. But if the statute changes the right,—if it gives a new and different right in place of the old one, and at the same time provides a new remedy, perfectly adapted to the complete enforcement of such new right,—the statutory remedy then becomes exclusive. What, then, is the effect upon the rights of the parties to a mortgage of the proviso at the end of section 4, art. 13, of the constitution? Does it or does it not change the right of the mortgagor? It is clear, in my opinion, that it does. Without it a mortgagor paying his debt after assessment and before levy would, in case of the failure or refusal of the mortgagee to pay the tax subsequently levied on his security, have the right to free his land of the lien by paying such tax himself, and then to recover the sum so paid in an action against the mortgagee. In other words, the measure of the reciprocal right and obligation of the parties would be the tax levy for the current year. But the proviso under consideration creates a different right, and necessarily a different obligation. It empowers the mortgagor to retain the amount of the mortgagee's assessment, computed according to the rate levied the previous year. This may be more or may be less than the actual levy for the current year. It will seldom be the same, and may sometimes be very considerably greater or less. Whatever it is, however, the mortgagor may retain it, and the mortgagee must submit to the deduction. Though both parties may have the best reason to believe that the rate of levy for the current year will not be half that of the previous year, the mortgagor may nevertheless retain an amount computed according to the old rate, and it is not pretended that the mortgagee can, after the new levy, recover the difference. If this is so,—if the mortgagee must submit without redress to all the burdens of a rule enacted for the advantage of the mortgagor,—it would seem that he ought also to enjoy its benefit. The mortgagor, if he can always take according to the previous year's levy when he finds his advantage in so doing, ought not to be allowed to take according to the levy for the current year when that happens to be to his advantage. The rule, to be fair, ought to be invariable, and, in my opinion, it is. What the mortgagee must give the mortgagor must take. It was never intended to establish two standards of compensation, to either of which the mortgagor may resort, as his interest may dictate. On the contrary, it is much more reasonable to hold that the constitution fixes one exact measure of the rights and obligations of the parties, which is equally binding upon both.

If this conclusion is well founded, it follows that the question first above stated must be answered in the negative for two reasons: The mortgagor paying his debt after assessment and before levy cannot neglect to retain the taxes computed according to the levy of the previous year, and afterwards maintain an action to recover the taxes subsequently assessed and paid—First, because such subsequently assessed tax is not the sum which he is entitled to receive; and, second, because the constitution has given him an exclusive remedy for the enforcement of the right (to retain an amount computed according to the previous year's levy) which it has substituted for that which he would otherwise have had. The reasons for this conclusion are greatly strengthened by its expediency. It is not only advantageous to the parties; it is emphatically to the interest of the public to avoid and discourage unnecessary litigation. The mortgagor, having in his own hands the absolute power to protect himself, should not be allowed to deliberately disregard the constitutional provisions for his security in order to vex the public tribunals with a gratuitous lawsuit. The mortgagor who purposely neglects to avail himself of the proviso under consideration is entitled to no more favor than one who has actually paid taxes on the mortgagee's interest before he pays his debt, and yet deliberately omits to deduct the amount so paid for the purpose of suing to recover it back. Each case in fact stands upon precisely the same footing. In each the mortgagor at the time of paying his debt knows that there is a certain fixed sum which he is entitled to deduct from the total amount secured,—a sum in no way dependent as to its amount upon future contingencies. Why should he be allowed in one case any more than in the other, after making a purely voluntary payment of such sum, to maintain an action to recover it back? It will be observed that I speak of a voluntary and deliberate payment, and I do so for the reason that such is the case before us. If the payment of the whole amount of the debt without deduction of the taxes had been induced by any fraud or duress or mistake, or if the deduction had been waived in consideration of a promise by the appellant to pay the tax subsequently levied, the case would have been essentially different.

In the case of Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 504, 14 Fed. Rep. 281, the mortgagor paid the whole debt under protest, and under what seems to have been regarded as a species of duress, the mortgagee refusing to satisfy the mortgage upon any other terms, and thereby preventing the mortgagor from making use of his property. The conduct of the mortgagee in that case may well have justified the decision, and I should myself be disposed to uphold an action based upon the same or analogous grounds. If the mortgagor is forced to pay by duress; if he pays in ignorance of his rights, or is induced by any fraud or promise to pay without making the deduction,—I should say that he was entitled to recover, not the sum which he afterwards actually pays on account of the mortgagee's taxes, but the sum which he overpaid by the mistake, etc., or the sum which the mortgagee has agreed to pay in consideration of his forbearance. I cannot, however, bring myself to the view that the constitution gives a double right to the mortgagor, by which he is enabled to take out a sum computed according to the levy of the previous year if he so desires, or, if it appears more profitable, waive his right of deduction for the chance of recovering a larger sum by action. The constitution was not designed to encourage that kind of speculation.

These views, if correct, are decisive of the present appeal, and a discussion of the second question above stated might be dispensed with. But it will throw some additional light upon the meaning of the constitution to consider the effect of its provisions upon the rights and duties of an assignee of the mortgage who holds it at the time of payment by assignment made subsequent to the assessment. It is plain that in such case the assignment does not impair the right of the mortgagor to deduct the tax at the time of paying his debt, and the parties to the assignment necessarily treat with reference to the known right of the mortgagor and the corresponding liability of the holder of the mortgage. The assignee will not pay, and the assignor cannot expect to receive, more than the amount of the debt, less the amount which the mortgagor has the right to deduct. The necessary effect of the constitution, therefore, is not only to compel the person who holds the mortgage at the time of payment to submit to a deduction of his accrued tax, but also to compel each successive owner of the security to pay such tax to his assignee at the time of the transfer. This being so, it would be a manifest injustice to compel him to pay it a second time, but this is precisely what the respondent is seeking to do if the fact is such as, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed to be. The appellant has already paid its tax to its assignee. The assignee necessarily assumed the duty of paying it to respondent, and respondent had the absolute right and power to compel it to pay. Instead of standing on its right, it releases the assignee, and seeks to compel the appellant to pay twice. Thus, upon the theory that the mortgagor may at his option deduct the mortgagee's tax computed according to the levy of the previous year, or sue for the actual amount subsequently levied, a rule sufficiently unequal and unfair between the original parties to the mortgage is made to operate with still greater injustice between parties by assignment. The only answer to this proposition is that the assignor can protect himself by exacting a special agreement on the part of the assignee to refund the amount of the accrued tax in case the mortgagor shall not elect to deduct it at the time of payment. It is true that he might protect himself in this way, but to hold that he must do so is to assume that the framers of the constitution intended to plant in every assignment of a mortgage the seeds of future litigation. In the face of a provision evidently designed to secure absolutely the rights of the parties without litigation, it ought not to be held that a part of the scheme was to make a transaction so usual, so legitimate, and often so necessary, as the assignment of a mortgage, impossible, except upon conditions involving a new subject of contention.

A great part of the argument of the respondent to sustain his claim against the assignor of the mortgage is devoted to the proposition that the tax levied upon the mortgagee's interest becomes and remains a personal liability to the state. The question whether a tax is a debt or personal liability of the person assessed depends altogether upon the statutory provisions for the time being; but the question here is not as to the construction of our revenue laws, but is wholly as to the meaning of a clause of the constitution. It is plain that the constitution compels the holder of the mortgage to pay the accrued tax, or what is treated as its equivalent, to the mortgagor at the time the mortgage debt is paid. He is at the same time compelled to satisfy and discharge the mortgage. Can it be supposed that the framers of the constitution, while making it compulsory upon him to pay his tax to the mortgagor, and surrender his security, intended still to hold him personally liable to the state for the same tax? Such a conclusion is little short of absurd, and it seems equally so to suppose that such personal liability was intended to be contingent upon the choice of the mortgagor to deduct or not to deduct the accrued tax at the time of paying his debt. On the contrary, it seems to me clear that, as to this particular tax at least, the constitution intends that the state shall rely for its enforcement upon its lien on the mortgaged premises,—a security which is more than sufficient in every case. Upon this view of the constitution, the rights of all parties, including the state, are amply secured without the necessity of any legal proceedings. Upon the opposite view,—the view that the mortgagor has an option as to the amount he shall take, and the time when and person from whom he shall take it,—all is uncertainty and confusion. There should be no hesitation in adopting the view which leads to certainty, security, and substantial justice in preference to that which involves uncertainty, insecurity, and inevitable injustice. My conclusion is that, if a mortgagor intentionally and deliberately omits to deduct the tax accrued upon the mortgagee's interest at the time of payment, he cannot afterwards maintain an action to recover it. If he pays his debt without deduction of the tax by mistake or fraud or under duress, he may have an action to recover back the overpayment, but in such case his right of action is against the party to whom the overpayment was made,—in this case the State Loan & Trust Company. The judgment and order of the superior court should be reversed.

BLONDEAU v. SNYDER et al. (No. 14,670.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1892.)

FORECLOSURE—PERSONAL JUDGMENT—CORRECTION.

A complaint in foreclosure alleged conveyance of the mortgaged premises to defendant, subject to the mortgage, but without anything further tending to show personal liability. The prayer, however, included a demand for personal judgment, and this was specified also in the summons. Held, that a judgment finding defendant personally liable, though erroneous, was not void, and could be corrected only on appeal or motion, within the time limited by Code Civil Proc. § 473.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. TORRANCE, Judge.

Action by Bernard S. Blondeau against Frances Snyder and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Order afterwards striking out certain portions of the judgment, from which plaintiff appeals.

Hendrick & Younkin and T. J. Capps, for appellant. Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Appeal from an order made May 15, 1891, striking out certain portions of a judgment rendered November 14, 1888. The defendants were personally served with summons in the action in which the judgment was rendered. The action was one for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by one B. F. Snyder in his lifetime, and it was alleged in the complaint that Snyder in his lifetime "conveyed the real estate specified in said mortgage to one Rosa A. Woodford, subject to said mortgage, who is now the legal owner of said real property." The prayer of the complaint was that the mortgage be foreclosed and the real estate sold, "and the proceeds applied to the payment of said sums of money and costs of this action, and that the said plaintiff may have judgment and execution against the said defendant for any deficiency," etc. The summons followed the prayer of the complaint, and gave notice that the action was brought to obtain a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage and for a sale of the premises, and, if the proceeds of the sale were insufficient, to obtain a judgment against the defendant Snyder "and Rosa A. Woodford for the balance remaining due," etc., and that upon their default the plaintiff would apply to the court for the relief demanded. The action was dismissed as to defendant Snyder, and the defendant Woodford did not appear, and her default was entered. The court, in its decree, found "that there is now due and owing to the plaintiff * * * from the defendant Rosa A. Woodford, upon the promissory notes and for money expended under the terms of said mortgage, as set forth and described in plaintiff's complaint, the sum of $2,116.65, and that the defendant Rosa A. Woodford is liable for the amount thereof." This portion of the judgment was stricken out by the order appealed from, and it is claimed by respondent that, as the complaint did not state any facts showing a personal liability upon the part of Rosa A. Woodford for the payment of said notes, the court was without jurisdiction to find such liability by its judgment, and that the judgment was and is in this respect absolutely void. This contention cannot be sustained. The judgment in this respect was within the relief demanded in the complaint and specified in the summons, and the court had jurisdiction, and, indeed, was required to determine in that action whether, upon the facts alleged, the plaintiff therein was entitled to the relief which he demanded in his complaint. The court undoubtedly committed an error in finding such personal liability, but its judgment was not for this reason void. The error could have been corrected upon appeal from the judgment, or upon a proper showing by motion, if it had been made within the time limited by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but it is now too late to do so by motion. The entry in the judgment docket, as to the defendant Snyder, was unauthorized, and as to her the order will be affirmed. As to the defendant Rosa A. Woodford, the order appealed from is reversed.

WILKES v. TIBBETS et al. (No. 19,091.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1892.)

Review on Appeal—Matters not Apparent of Record.

Where the transcript shows that the findings of fact cover all the issues raised by the pleadings, and the judgment follows and is in conformity with the findings and conclusions of law drawn therefrom, affidavits, though contained in the transcript, claiming that a litigant had been erroneously denied a jury trial by the court, will not be regarded on appeal, where it does not appear that the affidavits were served on the adverse party, or were filed in court or certified to as having been used at the hearing on a motion for a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by C. R. Wilkes against Luther C. Tibbets and another. From a judgment against them, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. C. Tibbets, in pro. per., and A. B. Paris for appellants. W. A. Purington and J. Ludewig Koethen, (Walter L. Koethen, of counsel,) for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment entered against them, and an order denying their motion for a new trial. The transcript contains the judgment roll, a notice of intention to move for a new trial, an order denying a new trial, and certain affidavits. The findings recite that: "This cause came on regularly for trial on the 20th day of May, 1891, before the court without a jury; a jury trial having been waived by the parties." And the judgment recites that, "a trial by jury having been expressly waived by the respective parties, the cause was tried before the court without a jury." The findings of fact cover all the issues raised by the pleadings, and the judgment follows and is in conformity with the findings and conclusions of law drawn therefrom.

The notice of intention to move for a new trial states that the motion will be made upon the following grounds: (1) Irregularity in the proceedings of the court; (2) order of court and abuse of discretion by which defendants were prevented from having a fair trial; (3) surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against; (4) errors in findings; (5) error in the judgment. The notice further states that the motion will be made upon affidavits. The affidavits are to the effect that, before the case came on for trial, the defendant Luther C. Tibbets duly demanded a jury trial, and that a venire was issued, and 16 jurors were summoned and were in attendance on the day set for the trial; that when the case was called for trial the said defendant asked to have a jury impaneled, but the court refused to comply with his request, and ordered him to pay the amount of the jurors' fees, $21, into court before he could be allowed to make his defense to the action; that he paid the said $21 into court, and the jurors were then discharged by the court, against the will, and without the consent, and in opposition to the demand of defendant; and that the said order of the court was an abuse of discretion, by which the defendants were prevented from having a fair trial. It is further stated that the court erred in making several of its findings, and that the facts found were not true; also, that it erred in its judgment, in stating that a trial by jury was expressly waived by the respective parties. Appellants contend that, in view of the facts shown by these affidavits, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Conceding, without deciding, that the point can be made on affidavits that a litigant has been erroneously denied a jury trial, still a conclusive answer to appellants' contention is that, while the affidavits here relied on are found in the transcript, it does not appear that they were ever served on the adverse party or filed in court, nor are they in any way certified to or identified as having been used on the hearing of the motion. This being so, they cannot be looked to here for any purpose, but must be wholly disregarded. Johnson v. Muir, 43 Cal. 542; Baker v. Snyder, 58 Cal. 617. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Vanclief, C.

ROBINSON v. TEMPLAR LODGE No. 17, I. O. O. F. (No. 14,285.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1892.)

Odd Fellows' Association—Sick Benefits—Decision of Appellate Tribunal.

In an action against a lodge of Odd Fellows to recover a sick benefit, the complaint alleged that, in the government of subordinate lodges of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, there are various appellate tribunals to review the action of subordinate lodges in failing to pay sick benefits, and that plaintiff, upon the failure of defendant lodge to pay him sick benefits, invoked the jurisdiction of said tribunals, and litigated his claim before them, and that they adjudged that plaintiff was not entitled to his claim, or any part thereof. Held that, by this allegation, the submission to this tribunal was a submission to arbitration and its decision and award, which, in the absence of fraud or mistake, is binding on plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by one Robinson against Templar Lodge No. 17, I. O. O. F., to recover a sick benefit. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellant. James G. Maguire and Davis Louderback, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover "sick benefits." The superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of defendant. The complaint alleges that defendant is a subordinate lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the state of California; that it is an unincorporated association of individuals, organized for the purpose of benevolence and mutual assistance, that in the year 1863 the plaintiff became, and ever since has been, a member in good standing of said lodge, and that "said defendant made and executed a written contract with plaintiff, whereby, in case plaintiff became sick while he was a member of said lodge, and was thereby rendered incapable of earning a livelihood, he was to receive and become entitled to the sum of $10 per week, * * * to be paid him by said lodge, as and for sick benefits, during such time as he was a member of said lodge, in good standing, and continued sick." The complaint then alleges that upon March 6, 1878, plaintiff became sick, and has since that date, continuously, by reason of sickness, been rendered incapable of earning a livelihood, and that defendant has failed to pay to him the said sum of $10 per week benefits since July 2, 1879, and on June 20, 1883, defendant "arbitrarily removed plaintiff's name from its sick list." After thus stating what plaintiff claims to have been the contract between himself and defendant, and its breach, the complaint proceeds to allege that, in the government of subordinate lodges of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, "said order has established various tribunals, appellate in character, to review and revise the action of subordinate lodges, including defendant, in failing to pay sick benefits to members, and provided that all members of defendant lodge should have the right to resort to said tribunal for redress in case of failure of defendant to pay sick benefits, * * * and that plaintiff, immediately upon the failure of defendant to pay him sick benefits, invoked the jurisdiction of said tribunals for the purpose of obtaining relief respecting the failure of defendant to pay sick benefits," and "litigated his claim to sick benefits before the tribunals of said order, and as a result thereof plaintiff was unable to obtain any relief whatever respecting said sick benefits, and the payments thereof; that the said tribunals of said order adjudged and determined on the 16th day of June, 1890, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the payment of his said claim for such benefits, or any part thereof."

It is not alleged that the defendant here has any provision in its by-laws to the effect that the benefits which it agrees to pay to its members in case of sickness shall not be payable except upon the favorable report or recommendation of some committee of the order specially authorized by its constitution or by-laws to investigate such claims for benefits. But on the contrary it will be noticed that by the terms of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, as stated in the complaint, the plaintiff was under no obligation to resort in the first instance to the tribunals established by the laws of the order under which defendant was organized, or even to make any demand upon defendant for the benefits claimed, other than by the commencement of an action therefor in some court of competent jurisdiction. It is, however, alleged in the complaint, as we construe it, that plaintiff did voluntarily submit his claim against defendant to the decision of the tribunals of the order of which he became a member when he joined the defendant lodge, and that such tribunals "adjudged and determined" that he was not entitled to the payment of the benefits now claimed, or to any part thereof. The question, therefore, is, what effect has this determination upon the right of plaintiff to maintain the action? It does not appear that plaintiff made any express agreement to be bound by the determination of the tribunals referred to; but we think that, when he voluntarily submitted to them for decision the differences which existed between himself and defendant, there was an implied agreement upon his part to be bound by their judgment or award, in the absence of any fraud or mistake or other cause which in equity would entitle him to avoid the same. "Where a matter is submitted to arbitrators, it is not necessary that there should be any express agreement to abide by the award when made; for the law implies such an agreement from the very fact of submission." Valentine v. Valentine, 2 Barb. Ch. 430. It would seem from the allegations of the complaint that the tribunals whose jurisdiction plaintiff invoked are established for the purpose of settling all matters of difference which may arise between a subordinate lodge and any of its members, growing out of a refusal upon the part of the lodge to pay benefits claimed, if the member consents to submit such matter to them for settlement; and it seems clear to us that plaintiff's voluntary submission of his claim for benefits to their decision was in the nature of a submission to arbitration, and their decision in the nature of an award, and should be considered equally conclusive. It is not alleged that there was any misconduct upon the part of those to whom he submitted the justice of his claims, or that there was any fraud or mistake in the award itself, or that, for any reason, the matters in difference between himself and defendant were not fully and fairly tried. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATKINSON v. JOHNSON, County Auditor. (No. 19,011.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1892.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DELEGATION OF DUTY BY LEGISLATURE — COUNTY OFFICERS — COMPENSATION—MOTION FOR JUDGMENT.

1. Act March 31, 1891, allowing boards of supervisors to fix the compensation of constables in certain counties, is void under article 11, § 5, of the constitution, as a delegation of the duty of regulating the compensation of such officers, expressly confided to the legislature. Dougherty v. Austin, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 1092, followed.

2. Whether said act is void, under article 11, § 9, in allowing an increase in the compensation of such officers after their election, or during their terms of office, does not arise in a case where the answer alleges that the compensation had been in fact diminished, and plaintiff has moved for judgment on the pleadings, since the effect of this is to admit the averments of the answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. COPE, Judge.

Action on relation of Richard E. Atkinson to enjoin J. T. Johnson, county auditor of the county of Santa Barbara, from issuing certain warrants under an ordinance of the board of supervisors. Plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, which was granted. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Putnam and Richards & Carrier, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and J. W. Taggart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The question involved in this case is the validity of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county, made April 10, 1891, fixing the salaries of the constables of the various townships of the county for their services in criminal cases. In each of the townships 1, 3, and 8 the annual salary for such services was fixed at $24, in No. 2 at $480, and in each of the remaining townships specific sums, varying in amounts. This order was made pursuant to subdivision 14 of section 183 of "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments" approved March 31, 1891, (Laws 1891, p. 377,) which subdivision reads as follows: "(14) Constables. A salary to be fixed by the board of supervisors, and paid monthly out of the salary fund, as the salaries of the county officers are paid, such salary to be in full compensation for all services of any kind, nature, or description required of them by law in criminal cases; and said constables shall be allowed to charge and receive for their own use such fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law for all services performed by them in civil cases. The provisions of this subdivision shall take effect from and after the approval of this act." Section 183, of which the foregoing subdivision is a part, relates only to counties of the twenty-first class, to which class the county of Santa Barbara belongs. Alonzo Crabb and C. H. Kelton were duly elected constables of township No. 2, in said county, for the term of two years, beginning on the 5th day of January, 1891,—three months and five days before the date of the order. Prior to the commencement of the action, the defendant, as county auditor, had drawn several warrants to each of said constables for monthly installments of $40 each, and this suit was brought to enjoin the further issuance of warrants under said order. The complaint, in addition to the foregoing facts, alleged that the compensation for services rendered by constables in criminal cases in said county was fixed by section 23 of an act entitled "An act to regulate fees of office and salaries of certain officers, and to repeal certain other acts in relation thereto," approved March 5, 1870; that the fees to which said constables were legally entitled were less than the said sum of $40 per month; that the board of supervisors had no authority of law to make said order; and that it was in violation of sections 5 and 9 of article 11 of the constitution of the state of California, and, therefore, null and void. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was properly overruled, and thereupon filed an answer admitting the making of said order by the board of supervisors, averring that they had authority to make it; that said constables were entitled to the compensation thereby fixed; and further alleging that said compensation was less than that they had theretofore received, or would have been entitled to receive under the act of 1870. Plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, which was granted, and defendant appeals.

There is no question that the order of the board of supervisors conformed to subdivision 14 of section 183 of the said act of 1891, and therefore the sole question is as to the constitutionality of that subdivision of said section. The answer having raised an issue as to whether the compensation of these officers was increased or diminished by the order, the answer alleging affirmatively that it was less, plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings admitted this averment of the answer. Fleming v. Wells, 65 Cal. 339, 4 Pac. Rep. 197; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 46; Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 257. It follows, therefore, that the order in question cannot be held violative of section 9 of article 11 of the constitution, which prohibits an increase of salary of an officer after his election or during his term of office. Said subdivision 14 of section 183 of said act, upon the constitutionality of which the validity of said order depends, is, however, clearly obnoxious to section 5 of article 11 of the constitution, as alleged in the complaint. This section of the constitution is as follows: "The legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks, district attorneys, and such other township and municipal officers as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their dutes, and fix their terms of office. It shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population. * * *" In the recent case of Dougherty v. Austin, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 1092, in which the opinion upon rehearing was filed May 30, 1892, this provision was carefully considered and very fully discussed. In that case the question arose upon an order made by the board of supervisors of Marin county, providing for the appointment of a deputy county clerk at a salary of $50 per month, payable out of the county treasury, which order was made under section 211 of the county government act, as amended in 1887, (St. 1887, p. 207.) That case, it is true, also involved the consideration of section 9 of article 11, which, as we have seen, does not arise in this case; but in all other respects the questions in that case and in this are the same. In Dougherty v. Austin, it was held that section 5 of article 11 above quoted, imposed upon the legislature the duty of regulating the compensation of the officers there named or designated in proportion to duties; that this provision was mandatory, and could not be delegated to the board of supervisors; and, under the authority of that case, subdivision 14 of said section 183 must be held to be in conflict with section 5 of article 11 of the constitution, and therefore void.

Judgment affirmed.

McFARLAND, J., did not take part in the decision.

NAFTZGER v. GREGG et al. (No. 14,705.)*
SAME v. MONTAGUE et al. (No. 14,704.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1892.)

ACTION ON NOTES—PLEADING—RES JUDICATA.

1. In an action on two notes the answer admitted the allegations in the complaint, but set out a contract for a deed to defendant from plaintiff, with the averment that the execution of the contract and the making of the notes were parts of the same transaction, and that the contract was the only consideration for the notes, and that no deed had been tendered by plaintiff. Held, that the complaint was defective, and presented no cause of action, in that it did not set out the contract, and allege performance by plaintiff of its conditions.

2. Where a judgment for defendant has been rendered in an action on notes because the complaint did not set out the contract under which the notes were given, and allege performance of its conditions, which performance was necessary for a recovery upon the notes, and where there is no issue tendered in the complaint or answer as to the performance of this condition, this judgment is no bar to an action on the notes and the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Two actions by A. N. Naftzger against W. F. Montague and others on two promissory notes. From a judgment for defendants in both actions, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to one action and reversed as to the other.

E. B. Stanton and Chapman & Hendrick for appellant. Goodcell & McIntyre, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The above-entitled causes between the same parties and relating to the same subject-matter will be considered together for convenience, if not of necessity. As No. 14,705 was first tried, it will be first stated. It is an action upon two promissory notes made by the defendants, each for $2,500, dated September 8, 1887, one payable one year, and the other two years, after date. It was commenced March 10, 1890. The complaint is in two counts in the usual form, and is, on its face, sufficient. The answer of the defendants expressly admits each and every allegation of the complaint, but alleges that there was no consideration for said notes, or either of them, other than a written contract of even date with the notes, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to the defendants, and the defendants agreed to buy from plaintiff, a certain lot or parcel of land, and to pay therefor $7,000,—$2,000 upon the execution of the contract, $2,500 in one year, and $2,500 in two years, from date of contract; the deferred payments being evidenced by the two notes described in the complaint. A copy of the contract is exhibited as a part of the answer, and contains the following: "In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said parties of the second part, [defendants,] the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and said parties of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto; and the said party of the first part, on receiving such payments at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the parties of the second part, or to their assigns, a good and sufficient deed conveying said land free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the said party of the first part; * * * and that time is of the essence of this contract." The answer further alleges that the defendants paid $2,000 at the time the contract was executed, and that "the plaintiff has not executed to the defendants the deed provided for in said contract, or any deed of conveyance of said land, or any part thereof." The court found as facts the execution of the contract; that defendants paid thereon, at the time it was executed, $2,000; that the notes in suit were given at the same time, as a part of the same transaction; and that "the plaintiff has not executed to the defendants the deed provided for in said contract, or any deed of conveyance of said land, or any part thereof;" and as conclusions of law found "that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in this action," and "that the defendants are entitled to judgment against the plaintiff for their costs;" and rendered judgment accordingly on July 29, 1890. The plaintiff appealed from this judgment on July 9, 1891, upon the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

No. 14,704 is an action (commenced October 11, 1890) upon the same two promissory notes to recover the amount alleged to be due thereon, and to enforce the vendor's lien upon the lot described in the contract of sale. The complaint differs from that in the former action (No. 14,705) only in that it sets out the contract of sale, alleges that the notes were made to secure the unpaid purchase money, and "that, after the maturity of said promissory notes, and before the commencement of this action, the plaintiff tendered to said defendants a good and sufficient deed conveying to the defendants the said premises described in the said agreement, free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the plaintiff, * * * and at the same time demanded of said defendants payment of the said promissory notes; but that said defendants then refused, and ever since have refused, to accept the said deed, and then refused, and ever since have refused, to pay the said promissory notes, or any part thereof;" and "that at the time of the maturity of said promissory notes the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, and still is, ready, willing, and able to carry out and perform his said agreement on his part, and to deliver to said defendants a good and sufficient deed conveying said premises to said defendants free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the plaintiff; and he hereby offers to deliver such deed upon payment of said notes." In their answer to this complaint the defendants "admit each and every averment thereof, except that as to the averment that the plaintiff was and is the owner of the land described in said amended complaint these defendants are not sufficiently informed to enable them to answer the same, and therefore they deny that the plaintiff was at any of the times mentioned in the complaint, or that he now is, the owner of said land, or able to convey a good title thereto to defendants." For a further answer they pleaded the former judgment in the above-entitled cause, No. 14,705, as a bar to this action. The plaintiff demurred to each branch of the answer on the ground that it stated no defense. The demurrer was overruled, and the cause was tried by the court. The court found as facts that the former action was between the same parties and for the same cause, and that it was therein adjudged and determined that the averments of the answer therein were true, that the plaintiff had failed to perform said contract of sale on his part, and that he was not entitled to any relief against the defendants on account of said notes or the purchase price of said land; and as a conclusion of law found that by the judgment in the former action the plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this action; and accordingly rendered final judgment in favor of defendants on July 7, 1891. From this judgment plaintiff appealed on July 9, 1891, upon the judgment roll containing a bill of exceptions.

*Affirmed in banc. See 99 Cal. 83, 33 P. 757.

1. On the appeal from the former judgment (No. 14,705) the appellant contends, in substance, that no defense to the action was either pleaded by defendants or found by the court, and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon the pleadings and findings of fact. It is true that the averment in the answer that the plaintiff had not executed to defendants the deed provided for in the contract, and the finding of the court that this averment was true, were entirely immaterial, since the plaintiff was under no obligation to execute the deed until the purchase money was tendered or paid, and could not be put in default without a tender of the purchase money by the defendants. Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420; Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429. But the setting out of the contract, and the averment that the execution of the contract and the making of the notes were parts of the same transaction, and that the contract was the only consideration for the notes, were material, since it thereby appeared that "the covenants of the vendor and vendee were mutual and dependent, and neither could put the other in default, except by tendering a performance in his own part, unless the other party either waived the tender, or by his conduct rendered it unnecessary." Englander v. Rogers, supra. And also that the complaint was defective in that it did not set out the contract of sale, nor aver that plaintiff had tendered to defendants a deed of the land. The averment of this new matter in the answer was a complete defense to the prima facie cause of action stated in the complaint, and the finding by the court that this new matter was true supports the judgment. It may be that the plaintiff might have obtained leave to amend his complaint by adding the averment that he had tendered a deed before the commencement of the action, if the fact had been so. But, for some reason which does not appear, he did not so amend his complaint. There was no averment in the pleading of either party, and consequently no finding, as to whether or not the plaintiff had tendered a deed; yet facts were pleaded by defendants, and found by the court, from which it resulted as a legal conclusion that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The plaintiff had failed to set forth that part of the contract which required him to tender a deed as a necessary condition of his right to recover on his notes, and also failed to state that he had performed that condition; and the new matter stated in the answer only partially supplied the deficiency, as it contained nothing in respect to a tender of the deed. It devolved upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that he had tendered a deed; otherwise it did not appear that the defendants were in default. The authorities, in addition to those above cited, which I think warrant this conclusion, are numerous, and a large collection of them may be found in 2 Bing. Real Prop. p. 716, c. 12 et seq.

2. On the appeal from the subsequent judgment (No. 14,704) the appellant contends, first, that his demurrer should have been sustained to that part of the answer which denies that plaintiff was the owner of the land he agreed to sell to defendants, or able to convey a good title thereto, and puts the denial on the ground that "these defendants are not sufficiently informed to enable them to answer the same." Section

437, Code Civil Proc., provides: "If the defendant has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation of the complaint, he may so state in his answer, and place his denial on that ground." It seems obvious that the denial in this case is not in substantial compliance with the Code, since it does not state that defendants have no belief on the subject sufficient to enable them to answer. But I think the point is of no importance, for the reason that the court made no finding upon the issue attempted to be made by this denial, and placed its decision solely upon the ground that the former judgment is a bar to this action. But the principal point relied upon for a reversal of this judgment is that the evidence does not justify the finding "that the cause of action alleged in the complaint was adjudicated and determined by the prior judgment," and I think this point should be sustained. The only evidence having any tendency to prove this finding was the judgment roll in the former action; and, as we have seen, the only material issues taken or tendered by the answer in that action related to the execution of the contract of sale, and the relation of that contract to the notes upon which that action was brought, it being alleged in the answer that the notes and the contract were executed at the same time, as parts of the same transaction, and that the contract was the only consideration for the notes, so that the notes and the contract were mutually dependent upon each other, and really constituted only one contract. Upon the issue thus tendered the court properly found for the defendants, and there is no exception to this finding. By the exhibition of the contract as a part of the answer not denied it was made to appear that, in order to put the defendants in default as to payment of the notes, the plaintiff was bound to tender (though not to execute) a deed for the land. As to whether the plaintiff tendered a deed before the commencement of that action, there is no allegation in the pleadings, and consequently no issue and no finding. Still, upon the findings that were made, the plaintiff, as above shown, was not entitled to recover on the notes; not, however, because it was determined by the court that he had not tendered a deed, but only because his complaint was defective in that it did not set out the whole contract, and allege that plaintiff had tendered the deed. But, as this defect did not appear upon the face of the complaint, it could not have been reached by demurrer. It therefore became necessary for the defendants to set forth the omitted branch of the contract, as they did; and they might have gone further, and averred that plaintiff had not tendered a deed, and thus have tendered an issue upon which the decision of the court would have been conclusive as to whether the plaintiff had tendered a deed. Gilmore v. Insurance Co., 55 Cal. 123; Schenck v. Insurance Co., 71 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. Rep. 807. But in addition to setting out the omitted part of the contract, the defendants only averred that the plaintiff had not executed the deed. This averment was immaterial. In the former action there was no issue, no admission by the pleadings, nor any finding by the court, as to whether plaintiff had tendered a deed. Nor was it necessary to the judgment rendered in that action that there should have been a finding, either express or implied, upon that question. Counsel for respondents contend, however, that under the pleadings that question might have been tried and determined, and that the judgment is conclusive upon all questions which might have been tried, although not expressly decided. But the judgment roll in the former action furnishes no ground for an implication or presumption that there was any trial or determination as to whether plaintiff tendered a deed. As to that matter the pleadings and the findings are silent, and no decision in regard to it was necessary to sustain the judgment rendered. Under these circumstances, there is not only no presumption that the question was tried, but the record shows that it could not properly have been tried. Meredith v. Ass'n, 56 Cal. 178. I think the former judgment (No. 14,705) should be affirmed, but that the latter judgment (No. 14,704) should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion it is ordered that the judgment in Naftzger vs. Gregg et al. (No. 14,705) be affirmed, and that the judgment in Naftzger vs. Montague et al. (No. 14,704) be reversed, and said last-named cause be remanded for a new trial.

3 Cal. Unrep. 622

CAHILL v. COLGAN, State Comptroller.

(No. 14,836.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1892.)

CLAIMS AGAINST THE STATE—APPROVAL BY BOARD OF EXAMINERS—APPROPRIATION BY LEGISLATURE—POWERS AND DUTIES OF STATE COMPTROLLER.

1. Where the state board of examiners have approved a claim, a subsequent change in the members of the board will not necessitate an approval by the new board to make the claim effective, the board being, in contemplation of law, the same board.

2. Pol. Code, § 672, provides that the state comptroller shall not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the board of examiners, or has been "exempted" from the operation of this section. Held, that when a claim has been approved by the board, no exemption from the operation of this section need be shown to authorize the comptroller to draw his warrant for it.

3. Where a petition recites that a claim was presented to the board of examiners, approved as chargeable to the state for expenses in a suit in which the state was a party in interest, transmitted with such approval to the legislature, and that the legislature appropriated money "to pay said claim" under an act entitled "An act making an appropriation to pay costs and expenses of suits in which the state is a party in interest," and authorized the comptroller to draw his warrant for the amount appropriated, such a recital sufficiently identifies the claim as the one for which the appropriation was made.

4. Where, in a petition for a claim which has been approved by the board of examiners, the petition states that the amount and "value" of such services was $504, the word "value" is surplusage, and requires no proof.

5. The approval of a claim by the board of examiners, and an appropriation of money to pay it by the legislature, is conclusive as to the validity of the claim as against the comptroller.

6. Where a judgment contained the recital that it "duly appeared" to the court that the prayer should be granted, the presumption is that the court had sufficient evidence to justify the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; VAN FLEET, Judge.

Application by P. H. Cahill for a writ of mandate to E. P. Colgan, as state comptroller, commanding him to draw his warrant on the state treasurer in favor of plaintiff for $504. From a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. J. C. Campbell and A. J. & Elwood Bruner, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The court overruled a general and special demurrer to the petition for the writ, and thereupon the defendant answered. The court then sustained a general demurrer to the answer, and, defendant declining to amend his answer, judgment awarding a peremptory writ, as prayed for, was rendered. The defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contends that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the petition, and also in sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to the answer.

The substance of the petition is as follows: That in July, 1889, the people of the state, by the attorney general, commenced an action in the superior court of San Francisco against the American Sugar Refinery Company, a corporation, to dissolve said corporation, and to recover a penalty, in which, on January 1, 1890, a judgment was rendered in favor of the people dissolving the corporation, and for a penalty or fine of $5,000 and costs. That on February 1, 1890, the plaintiff in said action applied to the court in which said judgment had been rendered for the appointment of a receiver in said action, to take charge of all the property of the defendant corporation. That upon such application a receiver was appointed, who duly qualified and took possession of all the property of the corporation defendant. That the petitioner herein rendered services for the plaintiff in that action in caring for said property while in the custody of said receiver, of the value of $504, which has not been paid; and that on July 7, 1890, petitioner filed his claim for said sum with the state board of examiners of the state of California in the words and figures following: "State of California, city and county of San Francisco—ss.: P. H. Cahill, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I was employed by the receiver of the American Sugar Refinery Company in that certain action entitled The People of the State of California vs. The American Sugar Refinery Company, a corporation, then pending in the superior court of San Francisco, on the seventeenth day of February, 1890, as watchman at the American Sugar Refinery, owned by said defendant corporation of this state, then in the hands of a receiver. That I worked from the eighteenth day of February, 1890, up to and including the ninth day of June, 1890, a total of one hundred and thirteen days, at the price of $5 per day, for which said work there is now due me the sum of $504, after deducting all payments made. That the work was faithfully performed in good faith, and that the sum of $504 is now due and owing me. P. H. CAHILL. Subscribed and sworn to before me this seventh day of June, 1890. DANIEL HANLON, Notary Public." That said board of examiners duly examined said claim and approved the same, and attached thereto the following certificate: "Form No. 126. Office of State Board of Examiners. Sacramento, ——, 1890. The annexed claim for $504, presented by P. H. Cahill for labor, is hereby approved by the state board of examiners for the sum of $504, chargeable to the appropriation for costs and expenses of suits in which the state is a party in interest, forty-first fiscal year, now exhausted, and, by virtue of the authority conferred upon this board by section 663 of the Political Code, do hereby transmit this claim to the honorable senate and assembly of the state of California, in the twenty-ninth session convened, with this statement of approval, and the recommendation that an appropriation be made to pay the same. R. W. WATERMAN, Governor, W. C. HENDRICKS, Secr'y of State, G. A. JOHNSON, Attorney General, State Board of Examiners." That on April 6, 1891, the legislature passed an act appropriating money to pay said claim, and others of like nature, and the money is in the treasury of the state, subject to the payment of said claim. That on May 8, 1891, the petitioner presented said claim, together with the allowance and approval of the state board of examiners aforesaid, and the said act of the legislature, to E. P. Colgan, comptroller aforesaid, and requested and demanded that he draw his warrant on the treasurer for the same, and that he then refused, and still refuses, to draw any warrant for the payment of said claim, or any part thereof.

The answer of the defendant denies that there was any judgment for costs in the suit of the people against the American Sugar Refinery Company; denies that the plaintiff in the last-mentioned action, by its attorneys, or either of them, applied to the superior court for the appointment of a receiver, but admits that a receiver was appointed in said action by the judge of said court; denies that the petitioner, Cahill, rendered services for the people of the state in said cause, and avers that whatever services he rendered were rendered to the receiver appointed in said cause, and were not worth more than three dollars per day; denies that plaintiff's claim is included with those for which the appropriation was made by the act of the legislature. The answer then avers, substantially, the following affirmative matters: (1) That in the case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. Rep. 121, the supreme court decided that the appointment of the receiver in People v. American S. R. Co. was null and void. (2) That P. Reddy, the receiver, filed his accounts in the superior court in the case of People vs. American S. R. Co., which accounts were passed upon and allowed by that court, including the item of $504 claimed by the petitioner, Cahill, but that such allowance was made without notice to the plaintiff or its attorneys in that action; and that thereafter the plaintiff in that action (the people) appealed to the supreme court from the order settling the accounts of the receiver, and from the order allowing Cahill $504, and that such appeal is now pending; and that since said appeal and the passage of the appropriation act of the legislature the board of examiners have refused to allow the claim of Cahill pending said appeal, by reason whereof "the state of California was never liable to said P. H. Cahill or to P. Reddy in the sum of $504, or any other sum; and therefore the passage of said act for the purpose of compensating said P. H. Cahill is a gift and donation, and in violation of the constitution of the state of California." (3) That the costs incurred by the receiver exceeded $24,000. That the complaint in People vs. American S. R. Co. did not pray for the appointment of a receiver, or for general relief. That the order to show cause for the appointment of a receiver was issued upon the court's own motion, and counsel in said cause did not have any authority to incur any liability on the part of the state of California, or to make any costs in reference to the appointment of a receiver; and, "for the purposes of a defense to this action and proceeding, this respondent hereby refers to the judgment roll in the case of People of the State of California vs. American Sugar Refinery Company." The answer contains other matters of mere argument and conclusions of law, which need not be stated or considered for the purpose of testing its sufficiency.

1. Did the court err in overruling the respondent's demurrer to the petition? The first ground upon which it is contended that the demurrer should have been sustained is that the petition fails to show that the present state board of examiners has passed or acted upon petitioner's claim, or approved the same. Conceding that this court may judicially know that the members of the board, at the time this proceeding was commenced, were not the same persons who composed it at the time petitioner's claim was approved, it is nevertheless, in contemplation of law, the same board. Counsel have cited no law or case, and I have found none, to the effect that a mere change of the constituent members of the board invalidates acts of the board done before such change, or necessitates a re-enactment or an approval of them after such change, in order to make them effective. See Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222. It is further contended that the petition does not show that petitioner's claim is exempt from the provisions of section 672 of the Political Code, but the contrary. That section of the Political Code forbids the comptroller to draw his warrant for any claim, "unless it has been approved by the board," or has been exempted from the operation of that section. Since the petition shows that petitioner's claim had been approved by the board, it needed no exemption from the operation of that section to authorize the comptroller to draw his warrant for it. This objection to the petition is probably grounded on the assumption that an approval of a claim continued in force only so long as the members of the approving board remain the same, which, as above shown, is unwarranted. It is further claimed that the petition does not identify the claim as one of those for which the appropriation was made. The petition states that petitioner presented his claim to the board of examiners; that the board approved it as a claim chargeable to the state for costs and expenses of a suit in which the state was a party in interest, during the forty-first fiscal year, the appropriation for which was then exhausted; that the board transmitted this claim, with such approval, to the senate and assembly of the ensuing session, and recommended that an appropriation be made to pay the same; that the legislature, at its next session, on the 6th day of April, 1891, in accordance with the recommendation of said board of examiners, did appropriate money "to pay said claim of petitioner, together with other claims of like nature, and that the money is in the treasury of the state, subject to the payment of said claim, and subject to the comptroller's warrant for the payment of the same." The appropriation act referred to is entitled "An act making an appropriation to pay the deficiency in the appropriation for costs and expenses of suits in which the state is a party in interest, for the forty-first fiscal year." It appropriates $1,059.40 "out of any money in the state treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to pay the deficiency in the appropriation for costs and expenses of suits in which the state is a party in interest (as approved by the state board of examiners) for the forty-first fiscal year." The second section authorizes the comptroller to draw his warrant for the amount appropriated and directs the treasurer to pay the same. The act was approved April 6, 1891, and took effect immediately. Reading the petition in connection with the appropriation act, to which it refers, I think it sufficiently identifies the claim as one for which the appropriation was made. Presumably the claim as approved, with the recommendation of the board that an appropriation be made to pay the same, was transmitted to the comptroller immediately after its approval, as required by section 661 of the Political Code, and remained on file in his office as an approved claim, for which he was commanded, by the section referred to, to draw his warrant in the order of its number, (126,) if, as alleged in the petition, there was money in the treasury applicable to its payment. No reason is apparent why the comptroller should have doubted that petitioner's claim was one of the claims for the payment of which the appropriation was made.

It is further claimed that the petition is defective, in that it does not show that petitioner's services were reasonably worth the sum claimed. No statement of the value of the services, in addition to what appears in the claim approved by the board of examiners, was necessary. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the comptroller may go behind and question the approval of a claim by the board of examiners and the appropriation act of the legislature in certain exceptional cases, this is not one of such cases. Here there is no question as to whether the claim or the approval thereof was fraudulent, or the result of a mistake; nor whether the board had lawful authority to audit the claim; nor whether the act of appropriation was constitutional. The sole question under this head is, did the board of examiners, in the honest exercise of undoubted authority, err in estimating the value of the services for which the claim was made? As to this question, the decision of the board of examiners was conclusive upon the comptroller. Section 436 of the Political Code provides: "All warrants for claims which have been audited by the board of examiners, and filed in his office, must be drawn in the order of the numbers placed upon them by that board." Section 661 of the same Code: "If the board approve such claim, they must indorse thereon over their signatures, 'Approved for the sum of ——— dollars,' and transmit the same to the office of the comptroller of state, and the comptroller must draw his warrant for the amount so approved in favor of the claimant or his assigns, in the order in which the same was approved." It is to be observed, however, that the petition does (unnecessarily) state that "the amount and value of said services was $504." This, taken in connection with the approval of the claim by the board of examiners as set forth in the petition, is mere surplusage, requiring no proof. I think the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the answer of the defendant.

2. The answer denies no material fact stated in the petition, and fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to this proceeding. The allegations in the petition that the plaintiff, in the suit of People vs. Havemeyer, applied to the superior court for the appointment of a receiver, and that there was a judgment for costs in that suit, were immaterial, except as matter of inducement, merely introductory and explanatory of the essential grounds of the proceeding, namely, the approval of petitioner's claim by the board of examiners and the appropriation of money to pay it by the legislature. Gould, Pl. 42; City v. Lamson. 9 Wall. 478. The validity of neither the approval of the claim by the board, nor the act of appropriation by the legislature, depended upon the truth of these allegations, and it is at least doubtful whether they were material or relevant matters for consideration by the board of examiners, since the petitioner's claim may have been lawful and just, even though there was no judgment for costs in the suit of People vs. Havemeyer, and no application to the court for a receiver therein. But, however this may be, the approval of the claim by the board of examiners and the appropriation of money to pay it by the legislature must be considered conclusive of the validity of petitioner's claim as against the comptroller, under the pleadings in this proceeding. The board of examiners has unlimited power to investigate the merits of all claims presented for allowance, and may act upon facts within the personal knowledge of its members, as well as upon evidence from other sources. Pol. Code, §§ 658, 666. It was the duty of the attorney general, as a member, to impart to the board his personal knowledge of all material facts in regard to the suit of People vs. Havemeyer, which suit had been prosecuted by him; and he must be presumed to have performed this duty. In the matter of approving and rejecting claims against the state, the board of examiners acts judicially, and its decisions in cases of which it has jurisdiction are not subject to collateral attack. In his work on Judgments (section 532) Mr. Black says: "When the statutes commit to a board of county commissioners, or supervisors, or auditors, or to a town council, the duty of examining and auditing claims against the municipality, their action in auditing, adjusting, or rejecting such a claim is judicial in its nature, and their decision is binding and conclusive, unless reversed on appeal;" citing, among other cases, Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222; Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373; Placer Co. v. Campbell, (Cal.) 11 Pac. Rep. 602. In Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222, the court said: "The acts of a board of audit, within its jurisdiction, in the absence of fraud or collusion, are final and conclusive, and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. Whether the claim is a proper town or county charge, in a case where it is doubtful, and rests upon disputed evidence, and what amount shall be allowed when not fixed by statute, are questions which the statute commits to the determination of the board of audit; and, however much it may err in judgment upon the facts, so long as it keeps within its jurisdiction, and acts in good faith, its audit cannot be overhauled, but is final, as well as to the taxpayers as to the claimant." See, also, Robinson v. Supervisors, 16 Cal. 209; Miller v. Sacramento County, 25 Cal. 94; Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 84; Scheerer v. Edgar, 76 Cal. 569, 18 Pac. Rep. 681; Bernal v. Lynch, 36 Cal. 135; Black, Judgm. § 250. The affirmative allegations of the answer do not constitute a defense.

What the supreme court decided as to the appointment of a receiver is a matter of law, and therefore not pleadable as a fact. But conceding, as a matter of law, that the appointment of the receiver was void, it does not necessarily follow that petitioner's claim against the state for services in watching and caring for the property while in the custody of the receiver was not a lawful claim to the extent allowed by the board of examiners, and confirmed by the act of appropriation. For the purpose of sustaining this proceeding it is sufficient to say that the state, as plaintiff in the suit in which the receiver was appointed, may have been responsible for costs and other consequences of the appointment of the receiver, even though such appointment was void, as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Code Civil Proc. § 1038; Adams v. Haskell, 6 Cal. 476; McDermott v. Isbell, 4 Cal. 114; Argenti v. San Francisco, 30 Cal. 467; Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187; Beach, Rec. § 313. Granting this, it may be presumed that the board of examiners found a state of facts justifying its conclusion that the petitioner's claim was a proper charge against the state, since its jurisdiction is apparent, and no fraud, collusion, or bad faith is alleged. It is not perceived how the order of the court allowing the receiver's accounts in the suit of People v. Havemeyer, or the alleged appeal from that order, can prejudice or affect the claim of the petitioner in this proceeding, who is not a party to that suit nor to that appeal.

In their reply brief, counsel for appellant make the point that the judgment was taken without any evidence on the part of the petitioner, and is erroneous for this reason. In answer to this it is sufficient to say that it does not appear that the court did not hear evidence, and the presumption is that the court heard whatever evidence was necessary to justify the judgment. The judgment contains the following recital: "And, respondent refusing to amend his answer, and it duly appearing to the court that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted," etc.

The point that the attorney general had no authority to incur any state liability for costs in the matter of the receiver, and therefore that the appropriation by the legislature to pay such costs was a gift, is not sufficiently plausible to merit special consideration, in view of the late decisions in the cases of Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. Rep. 1089, and Rankin v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 605, 28 Pac. Rep. 673. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

BOGART v. WOODRUFF et ux. (No. 14,742.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

Actions against Married Women—Misnomer.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 370, provides that, when a married woman is a party to an action, her husband must be joined with her. Section 434 provides that if no objection be taken to the defect of parties defendant, either by demurrer or answer, defendant must be deemed to have waived the same. Civil Code, § 158, provides that a wife may enter into any engagement respecting property which she might if unmarried. Held, that a judgment by default against a wife, in an action on a note in which she is sole defendant, is binding on her to the extent of her separate estate, where she failed to raise the objection that her husband was not joined with her.

2. An objection that a married woman is sued by her maiden name is without merit, where she is sufficiently identified by such name.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by Sarah B. Bogart against James Woodruff and Catalina Woodruff on a judgment rendered against Catalina Woodruff, in favor of plaintiff, in a suit on a note. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Modified.

J. A. Cooper and J. E. Pemberton, for appellant. J. M. Manuon, for respondents.

Per Curiam. The female defendant, before her marriage with the other defendant, being indebted to plaintiff, gave her promissory note to secure such indebtedness. About eight months after the marriage the plaintiff brought suit upon the note before a justice of the peace, against the wife alone, in her maiden name. She was then, and ever since the marriage had been, living with her husband. The summons was served upon her; and, as she did not appear and defend, judgment went against her, by default, June 25, 1885. This action, against both husband and wife, was commenced June 16, 1890, upon that judgment. The court found in accordance with the foregoing statement of facts, and that no part of the judgment against the wife had been paid, and from such facts, as a conclusion of law, that the defendants were entitled to judgment. The conclusion of the learned judge seems to have been based upon the proposition that the judgment against the wife, on which this suit was brought, was void for two reasons: First, because of the misnomer; and second, because the husband was a necessary party, without whom, in such an action, the court could not obtain jurisdiction of the person of the wife.

The Civil Code, § 158, provides that the wife may enter into any engagement or transaction respecting property which she might if unmarried; and, under the provisions of this section, it has been held that a promissory note of the wife, made after marriage, is a transaction by her respecting property, and that a judgment can be rendered against her upon such promissory note. Marlow v. Barlew, 53 Cal. 456; Alexander v. Bouton, 55 Cal. 15; Goad v. Moulton, 67 Cal. 536, 8 Pac. Rep. 63. But, as the community property is not liable for the contracts of the wife made after marriage, (Civil Code, § 167,) such judgment can be satisfied only out of her separate estate, as may also a judgment against her upon a contract made before her marriage. A judgment is one form of a contract; and by virtue of the provisions of section 158, Civil Code, a married woman may suffer a judgment to be rendered against her, as well as she may execute a promissory note. Such judgment, however, can be enforced only against her separate estate, as can a judgment upon her promissory note, and upon such judgment an action may be brought in the same mode as upon her promissory note. Section 370, Code Civil Proc., provides that, when a married woman is a party, her husband must be joined with her, except in certain specified cases, which are inapplicable to the present suit. The husband is a necessary party defendant, and the failure of the plaintiff to make him a defendant would defeat his right of recovery, if the objection be properly presented. One of the grounds of demurrer to the complaint is that there is a defect of parties defendant, and it is further provided that, if no objection be taken to the defect of parties defendant either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same. Code Civil Proc. § 434. If the wife suffers a judgment to be rendered against her in an action in which she is a sole defendant, without making any objection to the nonjoinder of her husband, whether such judgment is rendered after a trial on the merits or by default, she is bound by the judgment to the extent of her separate estate, and cannot thereafter, in an action upon such judgment, make the objection of such nonjoinder which should have been presented in the former action. Any attempt, however, to enforce that judgment against the community property, or the property of the husband, could be resisted by him, as he has not had his day in court. In an action thereon, as in an action upon the promissory note of the wife, the judgment should provide that it be enforced out of her separate estate.

The objection upon the misnomer of the wife is without merit, as she was sufficiently identified by the name under which she was sued. The judgment appealed from should be set aside, and a judgment entered against the wife, enforceable, however, only against her separate property; and it is so ordered.

REED v. LYON et al. (No. 14,709.)

TAX SALE—REDEMPTION—NOTICE—EFFECT OF DEED—PRESUMPTION OF REGULARITY.

1. Pol. Code, § 3785, provides that the purchaser at a tax sale shall serve notice to redeem on the owner, stating the amount then due on the land for taxes, costs, etc., before asking for a deed, and that he shall be entitled to $3 for service thereof and for making affidavit to such service. Held, that the mere service of notice does not entitle the purchaser to the fee of $3; it being essential for him to make proof of such service and furnish the tax collector with such proof.

2. Pol. Code, § 3780, provides that the owner of property sold for taxes may redeem it within a year from the date of purchase, or at any time prior to his receiving notice to redeem, stating the amount due on the land for taxes, costs, etc., as provided by section 3785, which also provides that the time of redemption shall be extended indefinitely until such notice is served. Held, that a notice which stated an amount to be due, slightly in excess of what was in fact due, was not a sufficient compliance with the statute to bar the owner's right to redeem.

3. Pol. Code, § 3786, provides that the matters recited in the certificate of sale shall be recited in the tax deed, and that such deed shall be prima facie evidence that the property was assessed and equalized according to law; that the taxes were levied, and not paid; that the property was sold, and not redeemed; that the deed was executed by the proper officer; and that land sold for taxes on personalty belonged to the person liable to pay the tax. Section 3787 provides that such deed, duly acknowledged, is conclusive evidence of the regularity of "all other proceedings," from the assessment, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed. Held, that the "other proceedings" referred to are not acts required to be done by the purchaser pursuant to acquiring a tax deed, and that such tax deed is not conclusive evidence that notice to redeem has been served as required by section 3785.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Suit by Ira Hill Reed against I. L. Lyon and others to quiet title to a tract of land claimed by plaintiff by virtue of a tax sale. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willis, Cole & Craig, F. J. Solinsky, and Ira Hill Reed, for appellant. Harris & Gregg, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is plaintiff's appeal from the judgment. Plaintiff sued to quiet his title to a tract of land which he claims under a tax sale. At the trial he offered in evidence (1) the certificate of sale for taxes, duly assigned to him; (2) notice to redeem, preliminary to demand for a deed, pursuant to section 3785 of the Political Code; (3) tax deed to his assignor. To this evidence many objections were interposed, but none are insisted upon here, except that the notice to redeem did not state the amount due, but stated an amount to be due in excess of the true amount. The tax and costs for which the property was sold amounted to $18.66. Adding 50 per cent., authorized by statute, we have $27.99. The statement in the notice was: "The amount due at the date of this notice is twenty-eight and ninety-nine hundredths dollars."

Section 3785 of the Political Code provides that the purchaser shall be entitled to receive the sum of three dollars for the service of said notice and the making of an affidavit of service, "which sum of three dollars shall be paid by the redemptioner at the same time and in the same manner as other costs, percentage, penalties, and fees are paid." Appellant contends that inasmuch as the notice correctly stated the amount for which the property was sold, knowing which, it is easy to find the sum required to redeem, by simply adding 50 per cent., the notice did substantially state the last-mentioned sum, and the defendant could not be misled, and, further, that, as he was entitled to charge $3 additional costs for serving the notice and making proof, the amount stated was less than the amount due; that he had a right to remit part of what was due him, and the defendant cannot complain if he was willing to accept less than the sum actually due. Parties attempting to redeem have often failed to accomplish their object by offering or paying a sum somewhat less than the amount really due. No doubt one reason for requiring the notice was that the redemptioner might know what amount the purchaser claimed to be due. Paying this, I have no doubt a redemption would be effected, even though it should prove less than the amount really due. In this case I fail to see, however, that the amount stated in the notice was less than the amount really due. The notice must state "the amount then due." The $3 was not due when the notice was signed, or even when served; and not until proof of such service was made, and left with the tax collector. Therefore, it was not true that the amount then due was $28.99, or so much as that. But there is another view of that matter which appellant will find it difficult to answer. Sections 3780 and 3785 of the Political Code, in effect, extend the time of redemption for one year, and until the notice prescribed has been given. In the last-mentioned section, it is expressly stated that the time is extended indefinitely unless such notice be given. Since this is purely a matter of statutory control, it is evident that the notice prescribed must be given. No other notice will have that effect. A substantial, rather than a literal, conformity to the statute may possibly be considered sufficient. But beyond this the courts cannot go. The express requirements cannot be avoided on the ground that they serve no useful purpose. The time for redemption has not expired, unless such notice has been given. This requirement differs materially, and in some respects must be construed differently, from provisions chiefly designed to secure efficient and harmonious action on the part of revenue officers, who are to levy taxes, make assessments, and collect revenues for the state. The question then is, has the taxpayer been injured or deprived of some privilege or opportunity to be heard by the irregularity? Here the statutory notice limits the period of redemption, and until the prescribed notice is given the redemptioner is not called upon to redeem, and may insist upon strict construction of the statute. For the court to condone material irregularity here would be to deprive one of his estate, whereas the purchaser still holds his certificate, and may yet take steps to end the period of redemption.

But it is said that the deed, under section 3787 of the Political Code, is made "conclusive of all other proceedings [that is, proceedings not expressly mentioned in section 3786[1]] from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed," and therefore the question is not open. The deed, it is true, recites the notice, and from that recital the defect appears; but it is claimed that this recital is surplusage. The statute prescribes what shall be stated in the deed; that as to certain matters it shall constitute prima facie proof, and (section 3787) that as to all other matters, except actual fraud, it shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of proceedings "from the assessment, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed." This would present a difficult question, perhaps; but it has recently, since this appeal was taken, been considered and decided by this court in Miller v. Miller, 31 Pac. Rep. 247, where it was held that the other proceedings referred to, as to which the deed is made conclusive, are the acts and proceedings "required to be done and had at the hands of the public officials entrusted with the various steps leading up to the execution of a tax deed, and not, as in this case, to something required to be done by the applicant for the deed." It would follow that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

KIRK et al. v. ROBERTS et al. (No. 18,043.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

Assignment—Validity—Delivery of Possession—Assumpsit—Pleading—Rights of Assignee in Insolvency.

1. "Book accounts and bills receivable, including all debts of every kind due (the assignor) from any person," are "things in action," and as such expressly exempt under Civil Code, § 3440, from the statutory rule requiring a valid transfer of personal property to be followed by immediate delivery and change of possession.

2. H. having transferred by assignment certain book accounts and bills receivable to plaintiff, in part payment of a debt and as security, retained possession thereof as agent to collect the same, and subsequently defendant was appointed his receiver and assignee in insolvency. Held, in an action for moneys collected by defendant on such accounts and notes assigned to plaintiff, where the complaint averred demand on defendant and refusal by him to pay, that it was not necessary to aver or prove nonpayment of plaintiff's claim, such fact being a matter of defense.

3. An assignee in insolvency takes the property of the insolvent subject to all the rights and equities of third persons attached to it in the hands of the insolvent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by Kirk, Geary & Co. against F. B. Roberts, assignee of Walter R. Hall. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellants. H. M. Albery, for respondents.

Belcher, C. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 23d day of April, 1889, one Walter R. Hall was doing business in the town of Colusa, and was indebted to the plaintiffs in a certain large sum of money; that he was the owner of a large amount of book accounts and debts, due him from divers persons, and bills receivable; that on the day named he executed and delivered to the plaintiffs an agreement in writing, a copy of which is set out, that on the 1st day of August, 1889, he filed in the superior court of Colusa county his petition, schedules, and inventory in insolvency, and was thereupon adjudged to be an insolvent debtor; that defendant was appointed receiver, and afterwards assignee, of the estate of the insolvent, and that he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such; that defendant, as such receiver and assignee, took possession of all the property and estate of the insolvent, including the said book accounts, debts, and bills receivable, and thereafter collected of the money due on such accounts, debts, and bills a sum aggregating $2,000; that before the commencement of this action, and while defendant still retained in his possession the money so collected, plaintiffs demanded of him that he pay the same to them, but he wholly failed, refused, and neglected to so pay the same or any part thereof. Wherefore judgment is asked against the defendant for the sum named, with costs. The written agreement set out reads as follows: "Whereas, I am this day indebted to the firm of Kirk, Geary & Co., of Sacramento, Cal., in the sum of five thousand four hundred thirty-nine dollars and fifty-nine cents, ($5,439.59,) $4,024.28 being balance due on merchandise account, and $1,415.31 being amount advanced by them to me for the purpose of paying the claims of Redington & Co. and Chas. A. Bayly against me; and whereas, I am desirous of providing for the payment of said indebtedness: Now, therefore, I do hereby agree that I will pay said firm at least two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($2,750.00) within one year (1 yr.) from the date of this indenture, and to that end will make monthly remittances to said firm of as large an amount as I can; and for the purpose of further providing for the payment of said indebtedness, and in partial satisfaction thereof, (i. e., to the extent of the collections and remittances hereinafter referred to,) I hereby assign and convey unto said firm of Kirk, Geary & Co. all my book accounts and bills receivable, including all debts of every kind due me from any person; and I hereby agree with the said firm to represent it as its agent henceforth in the collection of said bills and book accounts; and I will reduce the same into cash as speedily as possible, and will remit to said firm the proceeds of such collections as soon as I obtain the money thereon. The whole amount of my indebtedness to said firm shall be fully paid within two years from the date of this agreement, and said indebtedness shall bear interest from date, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. This indebtedness, however, which is to be secured, further, by a mortgage to be executed by me and W. Y. Gamblin, in favor of said firm, shall be considered due at any and all times during the continuance of this agreement, at the option of said firm, without notice to me. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-third day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine. [Signed] Walter R. Hall. Witness: Albert M. Johnson."

[1] Section 3786 is as follows: "The matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed; and such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is primary evidence that (1) the property was assessed as required by law; (2) the property was equalized as required by law; (3) the taxes were levied in accordance with law; (4) the taxes were not paid; (5) at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer; (6) the property was not redeemed; (7) the person who executed the deed was the proper officer; (8) where the real estate was sold to pay taxes on personal property, that the real estate belonged to the person liable to pay the tax."

A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed and overruled, and the defendant then answered. The answer admitted that defendant as receiver and assignee had collected on the bills and accounts, which came into his hands as such, the sum of $635.72, but denied that plaintiffs were the owners of the bills or accounts, or that defendant was indebted to plaintiffs for the money collected thereon or otherwise. At the trial it was admitted that Hall "duly executed the instrument set out in the complaint, and that, at the time of its execution, he owed the plaintiffs the amount mentioned in said instrument, and that thereafter he filed his petition in insolvency, and that defendant was appointed receiver and elected assignee of his estate as averred in said complaint, and that as receiver and assignee he had collected, and as assignee he holds, retains, and claims, the sums stated in the answer of defendant to have been collected of the book accounts, bills receivable, and debts mentioned in said written instrument; and that plaintiffs had demanded payment thereof, and that the defendant had not paid plaintiffs any part of his said collections." It was also admitted that all the book accounts, bills receivable, and debts due, specified in the said written instrument, were scheduled and specified in the insolvency proceedings of Hall, and that they came into the hands of the defendant as the assignee of Hall. Hall was called as a witness, and testified that he executed the paper set out in the complaint, and that he remained in possession of the book accounts and bills receivable until he filed his petition in insolvency, and then turned them over to defendant. The above was, in substance, all the evidence on which the case was tried and submitted. The court found, among other things, that Hall executed and delivered to plaintiffs the written instrument set out in the complaint, but "did not sell, transfer, or convey the said book accounts, debts due him, or bills receivable, or anything referred to in said written instrument, to said plaintiffs; * * * that said written instrument was intended and understood by the parties as a written evidence or memorandum of a then existing indebtedness from said Hall to said plaintiffs, intended as an assignment to secure a then existing indebtedness from said Hall to said plaintiffs; that there was no immediate or any delivery from Hall to plaintiffs of the book accounts or bills receivable, or any thereof, mentioned in said written instrument, nor was there any actual or any change of possession thereof or any portion thereof;" "that at the time said Hall was adjudged an insolvent debtor, as alleged in the complaint, to wit, on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1889, it is not alleged in the complaint, or shown by the evidence, that Hall was indebted to the said plaintiffs in any sum whatever, nor was he indebted to said plaintiffs in any sum of money at the time this action was commenced;" and "that the complaint in this action does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, and the appeal is from the order denying their motion.

It is evident that the conclusions of the court were based upon the theory that the plaintiffs could not recover for two reasons: (1) Because the transfer from Hall to them was not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred; and (2) because there was no averment in the complaint, or proof on the part of the plaintiffs, that the indebtedness due from Hall to them had not been paid. We do not think this theory sound. The instrument was clearly intended as an assignment of the accounts, bills, and debts mentioned,—whether absolutely or as security is immaterial,—and, as between the parties, it unquestionably operated to transfer them to plaintiffs, and gave the plaintiffs a right to have the moneys when collected applied to the payment of their debt. The "things transferred" were "things in action," commonly called "choses in action," and were expressly excepted from the operation of the rule declared in section 3440 of the Civil Code. An assignee in insolvency has only such powers as are given him by the insolvent act. He may take into his possession all the estate of the debtor, and may sue in his own name and recover all the estate, debts, and things in action belonging or due to the debtor, and may also have and recover from any person receiving a conveyance, gift, transfer, payment, or assignment, made contrary to the provisions of the act, the property so conveyed or transferred. Sections 21, 55. But unless the transfer is made contrary to the provisions of the insolvent act, and is thus tainted with fraud, the assignee takes the property of the insolvent, subject to all such rights and equities of third persons as were attached to it in the hands of the insolvent. This is a well-settled rule under the bankrupt act, and we think it equally applicable to our insolvent act. Ex parte Newhall, 2 Story, 360; Mitchell v. Winslow, Id. 631; Yeatman v. Institution, 95 U. S. 764; Hauselt v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 406. Here there is no pretense that the transfer to the plaintiffs was fraudulent or contrary to any of the provisions of the insolvent act, and hence the fact that there was no immediate delivery nor any actual change of possession of the things transferred did not justify the court in denying to the plaintiffs the relief asked.

The second proposition, that plaintiffs could not recover because they failed to allege or prove that Hall's indebtedness to them had not been paid, was probably based upon the supposed authority of cases holding that a complaint to recover money due on contract is fatally defective unless it avers nonpayment. These cases, however, are not in point here. The complaint did aver demand made upon defendant for the money sought to be recovered, and that he wholly failed and refused to pay the same. We are cited to no case, and we know of none, which holds, in effect, that it was necessary to allege the nonpayment of Hall's indebtedness, and in our opinion such an allegation was not necessary. When one obtains an interest in a chose in action, by indorsement or transfer, the presumption is that that interest was obtained for value, and that it continues in the holder, until the contrary is shown. The point has several times been made that one suing on a promissory note, as maker or indorsee, should allege that he was still the owner and holder of the note, but it has always been held that no such averment was required. Poorman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 118; Hook v. White, 36 Cal. 299. Here, as we have seen, the plaintiffs obtained an interest in the accounts, bills, and debts transferred to them by Hall. The transfer was doubtless made to secure the payment of Hall's indebtedness to them, but, if so, no presumption can be indulged that the indebtedness had been paid, and the interest had therefore reverted to the assignor. If such were the fact, it was a matter of defense, and the burden was upon the defendant to show it. It will be observed that no proof of the payment of Hall's indebtedness was before the court, and therefore the finding that he was not indebted to the plaintiffs in any sum of money at the time this action was commenced was wholly unjustified by the evidence. In our opinion the order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, and we so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNES, C.

MALLOYE v. COUBROUGH. (No. 14,557.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1892.)

PARTNERSHIP — EXECUTION OF POWER OF ATTORNEY—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—EVIDENCE ALIUNDE—CONSTRUCTION OF POWER.

1. The execution by a partnership of a power of attorney cannot be proven by a notary's acknowledgment alone, since under section 1185 of the Civil Code the notary is not required to know or certify who are included as members in the partnership, but only that the person making the acknowledgment is the one he claims to be, or, in the case of a corporation, that he is the president or secretary of the corporation; and outside evidence is therefore necessary in order to show the existence of the partnership, and that the person mentioned is a member.

2. A power authorizing an attorney, upon nonpayment of a certain judgment, to institute such actions and proceedings as he may deem necessary, prove whatever may be due, give receipts, etc., and for any such purpose to use the names of the principals, and generally to act as fully as they could do, does not authorize an assignment by him of the judgment.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal by defendant from a judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The action is upon a foreign judgment, which it is averred "Abel Rey & Co., a copartnership doing business in London," before the commencement of this action, assigned to plaintiff. The assignment is denied in the answer. The court found on this issue against the defendant, and it is now contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding. It is not alleged who composed the firm of Abel Rey & Co., nor is there any proof upon that subject, except the certificate of the notary in the acknowledgment of a power of attorney under which the alleged assignment was made. Objection was made to the admission of the power of attorney as evidence, on the ground that the proof of its execution by Abel Rey & Co. was insufficient, and that the instrument did not confer the power upon the attorney to make the assignment. A like objection was made to the instrument itself when offered. All the objections were overruled, and exceptions to the rulings noted. These rulings are here assigned as errors, and urged in connection with the same points made under specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence. Harris, a notary public of London, Eng., certified in the acknowledgment "that the annexed power of attorney was this day signed, sealed, delivered, and acknowledged by the therein-named Abel Rey & Co., by Fernand Rey, (personally known to me,) a member of that firm, as and for the free and voluntary act of himself and his said firm, in my presence and in that of the other subscribing witnesses; further, that the signatures of 'Abel Rey & Co.' and 'Fernand Rey,' subscribed opposite the seal at foot of the said power of attorney, are the own proper handwriting of Fernand Rey," etc. Section 1185 of the Civil Code provides that the officer taking acknowledgment must know or have satisfactory evidence that the person making the acknowledgment is the individual who is described in, and who executed, the instrument, or, if executed by a corporation, that he is the president or secretary of such corporation. In this case the person making the acknowledgment was not Abel Rey & Co., and the statute does not impose upon the notary the duty of knowing who composed that firm, nor does he in fact certify that he knew him to be a member of the firm. He certifies that Fernand Rey was personally known to him, and in his presence executed the instrument, as his voluntary act, and that of his firm. It should have been made to appear that there was such a partnership and who composed the firm, and then when the assignment with the acknowledgment was offered, a prima facie case would have been made, from the identity of names, that the person executing it was a member of the firm. The partnership would show his authority to act for the firm. Fernand Rey was not an individual described in the instrument executed as the person executing it, or otherwise. That simply says: "We, Abel Rey & Co."

Nor do I think the power of attorney authorized the assignment. In terms, it authorizes the agent upon nonpayment of the judgment, or any part thereof, "to commence, bring, and prosecute all such actions, suits, and other proceedings in the courts of San Francisco, and elsewhere in America, as he may think fit or be advised, and to institute any proceedings in bankruptcy or insolvency, or for the liquidation of the affairs and estate of the said Henry Coubrough, or such other person or persons as aforesaid, and to prove against his or their estate or estates for all such sum or sums of money as may be due to us, as aforesaid, and, upon judgment or recovery of any such sum or sums from time to time, to give for us and on our behalf full and valid receipts, acquittances, and discharges therefor, and for all and any of the purposes aforesaid to use our names, and generally to act in and about the premises as fully and effectually as we ourselves could do if personally present and acting therein," etc. The power of attorney contains no general clause authorizing the attorney to do anything necessary or convenient in the collection of the judgment, but, on the other hand, as it seems to me, confines the authority to the institution and maintenance of suits, actions, and proceedings to that end. The general language at the conclusion is limited to the premise which defines what may be done. All these could have been done in the name of Abel Rey & Co. Therefore an assignee was not necessary in order to take any of the steps, or to institute and maintain any of the actions, referred to or contemplated as possibly necessary or convenient. In fact, the power expressly authorizes the use of the name of the constituent, and does not contain the alternative or otherwise. Had the letter of attorney authorized the agent to adopt any measure he might deem expedient, or had it been necessary to substitute an assignee for the purpose of maintaining any action or proceeding which might be thought advisable, perhaps the construction contended for should prevail. But under the circumstances I think the language cannot be so extended. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

DOUGLASS v. TODD. (No. 14,789.)

SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT—MISTAKE—COUNTER AFFIDAVITS.

1. Where defendant, against whom a default has been entered, shows a sufficient defense by affidavit, and gives as a reason for permitting the default that, after summons served, he was advised by an attorney, (naming him,) whose advice he relied upon, that he had no defense, the default will be set aside; Code Civil Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to relieve a party from a judgment taken "through his mistake," and Civil Code, § 1576, providing that "mistakes may be either of fact or law." Smith v. Tunstead, 56 Cal. 177, distinguished.

2. In a motion to set aside a default, the facts constituting a defense in defendant's affidavit cannot be rebutted by counter affidavits, as the court will not try the merits of the case on affidavits, but will hear counter affidavits as to the excuse for permitting the default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by L. B. Douglass against W. A. Todd. From an order vacating a judgment entered against defendant by default, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, for appellant. Cope, Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondent.

Haynes, C. Appeal from an order vacating a judgment entered against defendant upon default. The affidavit of defendant stated facts showing a sufficient defense to plaintiff's action,—at least as to the first cause of action. Plaintiff filed a counter affidavit, which, it is contended, rebuts the facts stated in defendant's affidavit. It is well settled that a default will not be set aside unless a sufficient affidavit of merits is filed; but proper practice does not permit the facts stated in defendant's affidavit, which constitute his defense to the action, to be rebutted by counter affidavits. The court will not try the merits of the case upon affidavits, but will hear counter affidavits as to the excuse for permitting the default. Francis v. Cox, 33 Cal. 323; Gracier v. Weir, 45 Cal. 53.

Defendant's affidavit, after fully stating the facts constituting his defense to the action, alleged, as the reason why he permitted a default to be taken against him, that as soon as he was served with the summons he consulted an attorney, whose name he gives, and explained to him the facts stated in his affidavit, and was advised by said attorney that he had no defense, and, believing and relying upon said advice, did not answer the complaint. Appellant does not deny, in his counter affidavit, that respondent received that advice, but denies that he made default for that reason, and alleges that it was because he supposed himself to be "execution proof." It is not probable that, if that was the reason why he permitted a default to be taken, he would have consulted an attorney in regard to a defense to the action; but having done so, and having been advised that he had no defense, it is quite natural that he should assert to plaintiff that he "could hang his judgment on the wall,"—that he couldn't collect it. Appellant contends, however, that the erroneous advice of counsel as to the law of the case upon which the defendant relied, and because of which he suffered the default to be taken, is not a sufficient ground for setting it aside. We are not referred by counsel to any case where this precise question has been decided by this court. Appellant cites cases where it is held that the negligence of the attorney will not avail to set aside a default, and contends that therefore his ignorance will not avail. Ignorance is often the result of negligence, though it cannot always be attributed to that cause. Defendant was not guilty of any negligence. Had he relied upon his own judgment as to the law applicable to the fact of his case, it might have been negligence. But he went to a practicing attorney, and had a right to suppose him to be competent, and was justified in acting upon his advice. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure[1] is broad enough to justify the action of the court below in relieving a party from a mistake of law on the part of his attorney, when by his reliance upon it he is prevented from making any defense. The language of this section does not limit the relief to mistakes of fact.

Section 1576 of the Civil Code is as follows: "Mistake may be either of fact or law." So that it would seem clear that in using the word "mistake" in section 473, Code Civil Proc., without any qualification, it was intended not to restrict the court in granting relief in furtherance of justice to that kind of mistake which involves only facts. That this was the intention of the code commissioners is plain from their note to section 1576 of the Civil Code. They said: "This chapter undoubtedly modifies the rule heretofore existing in this state as to mistake of law. * * * The rule that no relief should ever be granted on the ground of mistake of law seems too harsh, and in some cases might work great hardship. There is, however, no doubt that relief upon this ground must be granted with extreme caution, and only in a limited class of cases." In Whereatt v. Ellis, 70 Wis. 207, 35 N. W. Rep. 314, the syllabus, which correctly states the point decided, is as follows: "Where judgment for a considerable sum has been taken upon a default which was caused by the defendant following in good faith the advice of his attorney, and a meritorious defense is alleged, the court, upon application duly made, should grant a trial or hearing upon the merits, upon such terms or conditions as to do no injustice to the plaintiff; and a refusal to grant such hearing is an abuse of discretion." See, also, Morgan v. Bishop, 61 Wis. 410, 21 N. W. Rep. 263, and Hanson v. Michelson, 19 Wis. 498. In Baxter v. Chute, the supreme court of Minnesota, in an opinion filed June 13, 1892, (52 N. W. Rep. 379,) where a default was suffered because of the ill advice of counsel, reversed the order refusing to set aside the default, and held that "a mistake of law may afford ground for relief as well as a mistake of fact." To the same effect is Brown v. Brown, 37 Minn. 128, 33 N. W. Rep. 546. In both these states the language of the statute as to the ground of relief is the same as ours.

Of course, it does not follow that all mistakes of law are to be relieved against. A sound discretion, controlled by an enlightened judgment, keeping in view public interests and the due and orderly administration of the law, is to be exercised in granting that relief which justice between the parties to the cause seems to require. The view we have taken, and the authorities above cited, are not inconsistent with the cases cited by appellant. Most of those cases were bills in equity to be relieved against judgments based upon circumstances materially different from the case at bar. None of them decide that equity will not relieve in proper cases. Smith v. Tunstead, 56 Cal. 177, is much relied upon by appellant. That was a case of negligence on the part of the attorney. The court said: "In such cases as this," parties are held not entitled to relief on account of the negligence of their attorneys. If in no case parties were relieved from the negligence of their attorneys, there would be much force in appellant's argument that no relief could be had against their mistakes. But relief is granted against the negligence of the attorney, where it is excusable, and therefore appellant's argument fails.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 473, provides that the court may relieve a party from a judgment taken against him "through his mistake."

The terms upon which the order appealed from was granted, leaving, as it does, the plaintiff secure in his right to subject certain property of the defendant to the satisfaction of any judgment he may obtain, were proper, and prevent any injustice which might otherwise result to him. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

PACIFIC PAVING CO. v. BOLTON et al.

(No. 14,162.)

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—FORECLOSURE OF LIEN.

The act relating to street improvements (section 3) provides that, if no objection to the work is made within a given time, "the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order any work to be done." Code Civil Proc. § 456, provides that "in pleading a judgment or other determination of a court, officer, or board, * * * such judgment or determination may be stated to have been duly given or made," without stating the facts conferring jurisdiction. Held, in an action to foreclose a lien for a street assessment, where the complaint alleged that on a certain date the city council, "deeming it necessary, duly gave and made its determination to order the work done," that there was a sufficient averment of the action of council; the allegation that the order was duly given being equivalent to the statement that everything necessary to be done to give the order validity had been done.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Paving Company against Bolton and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Wood, for appellants. Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. The only question presented on appeal is as to the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint. Appellants contend that the complaint is insufficient, because it is not alleged that before ordering the work done the council passed a resolution of intention so to do, or that the superintendent posted or published the notice required by section 3 of the act under which the work was done. The complaint, however, alleges that "on the 24th day of July, 1888, the city council of the city and county of San Francisco, deeming it necessary, duly gave and made its determination to order the work done;" and this, we think, although not clearly expressed, is sufficient. The act provides (section 3) that "at the expiration of ten days after the expiration of the time of the publication, and at the expiration of fifteen days after the posting of any resolution of intention, if no written objection to the work therein described has been delivered, as aforesaid, by the owners of one half or more of the frontage of the property fronting on said work or improvement, the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order any work to be done." Our Code provides that "in pleading a judgment or other determination of a court, officer, or board, it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment or determination may be stated to have been duly given or made. If such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts conferring jurisdiction." Code Civil Proc. § 456. The board had no jurisdiction to proceed until the steps required by the statute were taken. When the requirements of the statute were complied with, the board acquired jurisdiction to make the order providing for the work. An allegation that such order was duly given and made is a statement, in legal effect, that everything necessary to be done to give the order validity had been done. Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 448; City of Los Angeles v. Waldron, 65 Cal. 284, 3 Pac. Rep. 890. There are some minor points made in appellants' opening brief, but we do not think they require special notice. The objection that the record does not show that the executors of Bolton were substituted in his place, has been obviated by the filing in this court of a certified copy of the order of substitution. Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. IVERSON. (No. 15,077.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1892.)

APPEAL—RECORD—CERTIFICATE OF UNDERTAKING.

The provision of Code Civil Proc. § 953, that the clerk or attorneys shall certify that an undertaking on appeal in due form has been filed, is not complied with by a general certificate that the record is correct.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

Action by David Jones, administrator, against Niles Iverson. From a judgment entered, plaintiff appealed, and defendant moves to dismiss the appeal. Motion granted.

Bert Schlesinger, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

Paterson, J. The respondent has moved, on several grounds, to dismiss the appeal. There is in the record a copy of what purports to be an undertaking filed in the court below, but there is no certificate of the clerk that an undertaking in due form has been properly filed. We have held several times that it is not sufficient to insert in the transcript a copy of an undertaking on appeal with a general certificate that the record is correct, but that it is necessary, in order to satisfy the express requirement of section 953, Code Civil Proc., to produce a certificate of the clerk or attorneys to the effect that an undertaking in due form has been properly filed in the court below. Swasey v. Adair, 83 Cal. 136, 23 Pac. Rep. 284.

The appeal is dismissed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. DEHAIL et al.

(No. 19,040.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1892.)

Improvement of Street—Invalid Ordinance.

A city ordinance for the widening and general improvement of a street, which has been adjudged invalid, and conferring no authority on the city to make such improvement, cannot be used as the basis of an action to condemn land sought to be included in such improvements.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against Alice Dehail and others to condemn certain land of defendants. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. McFarland, for appellant. J. L. Murphy and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondents. J. H. Magoffey, amicus curiæ.

Per Curiam. Action to appropriate to the use of the plaintiff as a public street certain lands of the defendants, under proceedings taken by virtue of the act of March 6, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 70.) The complaint sets forth an ordinance for the widening of First street from Los Angeles street to Alameda street, adopted by the plaintiff July 8, 1889, and also the various steps taken by the municipality under that ordinance; and alleges that a portion of the land required for the widening of the street is the property of the defendant Alice Dehail, and that the commissioners appointed under said ordinance have determined that she will be damaged by said improvement in the sum of $3,718.50; that this amount of money has been tendered to her, with a request that she execute a deed for said land to the city, and that she has refused to accept the money or make the deed; and prays judgment for the condemnation of said land upon the payment to the defendants, or into court for their benefit, of the amount of compensation therefor to which they are entitled. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained, and from the judgment rendered thereon in favor of the defendants the plaintiff has appealed.

In Dehail v. Morford, 95 Cal. 457, 30 Pac. Rep. 593, it was held that the ordinance under which these proceedings were taken did not confer upon the city any jurisdiction to make the improvement contemplated thereby, and it is very evident that, if the ordinance was insufficient to give to the city any jurisdiction to make the improvement, the commissioners appointed under that ordinance would have no authority to determine the amount of money which the owners of the land to be taken should accept for its conveyance to the city, and that the owners cannot be compelled to accept that amount, or to make a conveyance of their land. This action cannot be upheld as a proceeding to condemn the land in question under the power of eminent domain, or by virtue of the provisions of section 18 of the act of March 6, 1889. Before such proceedings can be instituted, it is necessary that the municipality shall have passed a valid ordinance for the widening of the street. As the ordinance in question conferred no authority to make the improvement, it cannot be used as the basis of any action for condemnation of the land sought to be included in the improvement.

The judgment is affirmed.

WATTS v. GALLAGHER et al. (No. 14,662.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1892.)

Mortgage on Homestead—Foreclosure—Parties—Sale.

1. A sale under an action to foreclose a mortgage on "homestead premises" is void as against the wife of defendant when she is not made a party to such action.

2. In such case the wife is entitled to possession of the "premises" without paying such mortgage indebtedness, or any part thereof.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Watts against Gallagher and others to recover possession of certain land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. M. Rosborough, Geo. M. Shaw, and Jas. C. Martin, for appellants. Crittenden Thornton, F. H. Merzbach, and Rhodes Borden, for respondent.

De Haven, J. This an action to recover possession of a tract of land, the title to which was on July 29, 1878, vested in one William A. Watts as his separate property. On that day he executed a mortgage thereon to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, to secure his promissory note for $1,500. In September, 1879, the said Watts, who was then, and still is, the husband of plaintiff, filed a declaration of homestead upon the premises, and thereafter the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society commenced an action against him to foreclose the mortgage referred to, and upon February 5, 1883, obtained judgment in the action directing a sale of the land in controversy to satisfy the same. The plaintiff here was not made a party to that action. Thereafter the land was sold under that decree to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, and, no redemption from such sale having been made, that corporation received a sheriff's deed therefor. The defendant Gallagher purchased the land from the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, and of course succeeded to whatever title was vested in his grantor by the foreclosure proceedings before mentioned. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below, and the defendants appeal.

1. There being a valid homestead on the premises at the date of the commencement of the action to foreclose the mortgage thereon, the plaintiff here was a necessary party to that action; and the judgment therein, in so far as it directed the sale of such homestead premises, was void as against her. Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 72; Hefner v. Urton, 71 Cal. 479, 12 Pac. Rep. 486; Building Ass'n v. Chalmers, 75 Cal. 332, 17 Pac. Rep. 229; Morris v. Ward, 5 Kan. 239. The filing of the declaration of homestead gave to the plaintiff an interest in the premises of which she could not be divested by any act of her husband alone, or by any action taken against him alone. As said by this court in Hefner v. Urton, 71 Cal. 479, 12 Pac. Rep. 486: "By the declaration of homestead some portion of his title (just what portion is not necessary now to be determined) passed from him to his wife. He could no longer mortgage or sell unless she joined with him She had the right of residence thereon with him and the family during their joint lives, with some rights in case she should survive him. She had a right of redemption as his successor in interest. Code Civil Proc. § 701, subd. 1. In order to foreclose her interest, and have a complete settlement of the question involved, viz., whether the mortgage was a lien, she was a necessary party. She would have had a right to question the execution or validity of the mortgage; whether it was barred; whether it had been paid."

2. The court below found that the note and mortgage made by plaintiff's husband to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society had never been paid or satisfied, in whole or in part, other than by the sale under the foreclosure proceedings; and it is claimed by defendants that the plaintiff should not be allowed to recover in this action, except upon the condition that she pay the amount of this note and mortgage. We do not think the fact that plaintiff's husband has not paid the amount due upon this note is any defense to this action. Under that mortgage the grantor of defendant Gallagher was not entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises until after the expiration of the time for redemption for a sale under a valid foreclosure of the mortgage; and, conceding that Gallagher is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of his grantor, as holder of the mortgage referred to, he is not at this time entitled to withhold from plaintiff the possession of the land in controversy.

3. The evidence was sufficient to justify the finding of the court to the effect that plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

HISTORY CO. v. LIGHT, Justice of the Peace.

(No. 18,001.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1892.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—RULING AS TO JURISDICTION—REVIEW ON CERTIORARI.

A justice of the peace has jurisdiction to entertain a motion to set aside service of a summons, and pass upon the truth of the allegations of the complaint on which jurisdiction of defendant is based, and his decision cannot be reviewed on certiorari.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Certiorari on the petition of the History Company to review a decision of Charles Light, a justice of the peace. The writ was dismissed, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Webster and L. W. Elliott, for appellant. James F. Tevlin and R. Percy Wright, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioner commenced this proceeding in the superior court for the purpose of annulling an order made by a justice of the peace in San Joaquin, setting aside the service of a summons made in a certain action pending in the court of said justice of the peace, wherein the petitioner was plaintiff and one Quackenbush defendant. Upon the return made to the writ of certiorari, the superior court dismissed the proceeding, and the petitioner appeals.

The justice of the peace had jurisdiction to entertain the motion of the defendant therein to set aside the service of the summons made upon him in a county other than that in which the action was pending. Section 848 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as applicable to this case, is as follows: "Sec. 848. The summons cannot be served out of the county of the justice before whom the action is brought, except * * * when an action is brought against a party who has contracted to perform an obligation at a particular place, and resides in a different county, in which case summons may be served in the county where he resides." It is clear that a defendant has the right to move the court to set aside the service of a summons attempted to be made in violation of the provisions of this section; and the motion is properly made, as it was in this case, upon affidavits showing the grounds of the motion. The fact that the unverified complaint filed in the action alleged that the contract sued upon was to be performed by the defendant therein in the county in which such action was brought did not foreclose all inquiry as to the fact, and deprive the justice of the peace of jurisdicton to pass upon the truth of that allegation upon the motion to set aside the service of the summons. The burden of proving the improper service is, of course, upon the defendant in such a motion, and he should be required to present a clear case. But, the justice having jurisdiction to hear and decide the motion, his decision thereon cannot be reversed or annulled upon certiorari, no matter whether such decision was right or wrong upon the evidence before him. Buckley v. Superior Court, (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 8; Sherer v. Superior Court, (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 565, (No. 15,231.) The action of the superior court in dismissing the proceeding was correct, and must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA v. ALASKA IMP. CO. (No. 14,198.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1892.)

Banks and Banking — Statements of Assets and Liabilities —Sufficiency—Publication—Right to Sue.

1. St. 1875–76, p. 729, provides that banking corporations shall publish and record statements each year in January and July; that one of such statements shall show the amount of capital stock actually paid in, and the other shall show the actual condition and value of its assets and liabilities, and where the assets are situated. Plaintiff filed a statement which, omitting the figures, was, under the head of "Liabilities;" "Capital," $———; "Circulation," $———; "Deposits," $———; "Bills payable and other liabilities," $———; "Undivided net profits," $———; "Total," $———; and under the head of "Assets:" "Specie on hand and cash at banker's," $———; "Bills receivable and other securities," $———; "Investments," $———; "Bank premises," $———; "Total," $———,—a sum equaling the liabilities. Held, that the statement was not a substantial compliance with the statute.

2. The statute further requires that the statements filed shall be sworn statements, verified, in the case of foreign corporations, by the agent or manager of the business resident in the state. Plaintiff's statement was followed by an affidavit of the managing agent at San Francisco, which stated that the bank has its principal place of business in London; that the accounts of the San Francisco agency are made up twice each year, and forwarded to the London office, where a general statement is prepared and sent to the San Francisco office; that the foregoing is a correct copy of the last statement received. There was nothing in the affidavit to show that the statement was sworn to by any officer or employe of the bank, or that the affiant believed the statement to be true, only that it was a true copy of the last statement received. Held, that this was not a sworn statement, within the meaning of the statute.

3. The statute prohibits one violating the same from prosecuting any action in the state until the statute is complied with. Held, that such disability is universal, and therefore plaintiff could not maintain an action on the bills in suit on the ground that the transactions out of which the suit grew were personal contracts, made out of the state, and that plaintiff ought not to be deprived of the privilege accorded foreigners of pursuing their remedies against residents of the state on such contracts.

4. The statute requires that the statements be published each year in January and July. It appeared that plaintiff could not get its statement from London before about the middle of February and August, and did not publish them until the following July or January, respectively. Held that, thought it would have been a more substantial compliance with the statute to have published the statements as soon as received, yet withholding them until the recurrence of the next July or January would not, of itself, have been considered a fatal defect, since it would have been presumed that the delay was caused by the supposition that the publication could be legally made only in the months named in the statute, and was therefore intended in good faith as a compliance with its requirements.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by the Bank of British North America against the Alaska Improvement Company to recover on certain bills of exchange. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant.

Smith & Pomeroy, for respondent, in support of the proposition that plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action because the penalties against suing imposed by the banking act are not applicable to this case, for the reason that the banking business done by plaintiff in purchasing the bills of exchange was done in a foreign country, cited the following New York cases: Garrison v. Howe, 17 N. Y. 466; Bonnell v. Griswold, 80 N. Y. 128; Whitaker v. Masterson, 100 N. Y. 277, 12 N. E. Rep. 604; Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62, and 68 N. Y. 34; and Pier v. Hanmore, 86 N. Y. 95.

Haynes, C. Appeal from the judgment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action is upon certain bills of exchange drawn by the defendant upon William T. Coleman & Co., payable to the order of defendant 60 days after date, and by the defendant indorsed and delivered to said William T. Coleman & Co., who, before maturity, sold and delivered the same to plaintiff. These bills were afterwards duly accepted by W. T. Coleman & Co., who failed to pay them at maturity, of all which the defendant was notified. Defendant's answer, in addition to denials not necessary to be noticed, alleged that, after the defendant indorsed said bills of exchange, said William T. Coleman & Co., the drawee, paid the same to defendant, whereby the defendant was released and discharged from liability thereon as drawer and indorser; and, for a further defense, alleged that plaintiff, for more than two years last past, was a banking corporation doing business in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and during all that time was, and still is, subject to an act of the legislature of that state, approved April 1, 1876, concerning corporations and persons engaged in the business of banking; that plaintiffs had not complied with certain provisions of that act, (hereinafter mentioned,) and because thereof was prohibited from bringing or maintaining any action in the courts of this state. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and as to the answer found all the allegations untrue, except that plaintiff had been doing business as a banking corporation for more than two years at the place alleged, and that there were many newspapers of general circulation published in the city of San Francisco.

The act referred to (St. 1875-76, p. 729) requires: (1) That two statements shall be published and recorded each year in January and July. (2) That one of such statements shall state the amount of capital stock actually paid in, and that nothing shall be deemed capital actually paid in except money bona fide paid into the treasury of such bank. (3) The other of said statements shall show the actual condition and value of its assets and liabilities, and where the assets are situated. The statements are required to be "sworn statements," verified by certain officers in case of a home corporation, and in case of a foreign corporation "the statements herein provided for shall be verified by the agent or manager of the business resident in this state." These statements are required to be recorded in the office of the county recorder, one in a book entitled "Statements of Banking Capital," and the other in a book entitled "Statements of Banking Assets." The third section of this act is as follows: "Sec. 3. Directors making a false statement shall be jointly and severally liable to any person hereafter dealing with such corporation, to the full extent of such dealing; and no corporation and no person or persons who fail to comply with the provisions, or any of the provisions, of this law, shall maintain or prosecute any action or proceeding in any of the courts of this state until they shall have first duly filed the statements herein provided for, and in all other respects complied with the provisions of this law; nor shall any assignee or assignees of any such corporation or person, whose assignment shall be made subsequent to any such failure to comply with the provisions of this law, maintain any action or proceeding in any court of this state until his or their assignor or assignors shall have first duly complied with the provisions of this law." Appellant contends that the plaintiff has not complied with the requirements of said statute in several particulars: (1) That the statements published and recorded by the plaintiff do not show the amount of the capital actually paid, in money and in good faith, into the bank; (2) that the statements published and recorded by the plaintiff were not "sworn statements;" (3) that, if the statements should be held sufficient as to form and substance, they do not show the condition of the bank in the particulars required for the six months immediately preceding the publication and recording, but of a period ending more than six months prior thereto.

1. The statute contemplates two statements, but we are not prepared to hold that if the one statement contained all the particulars required by the statute it would not be sufficient, inasmuch as the statement was recorded in each of the books, and the information required could be ascertained from either. We think, however, that the statements put in evidence by the plaintiff were not a substantial compliance with the statute. These statements, omitting the figures, were, under the head of "Liabilities:" "Capital," $———; "Circulation," $———; "Deposits," $———; "Bills payable and other liabilities," $———; "Undivided net profits," $———; "Total," $———; and under the head "Assets:" "Specie on hand and cash at banker's," $———; "Bills receivable and other securities," $———; "Investments," $———; "Bank premises," $———; "Total," $———,—a sum equaling the liabilities. The statute requires a statement of the amount of capital actually paid in in money; and thus excludes subscribed capital not paid, and all securities of every description which may be held to represent capital. So in regard to the statement of assets, the statute requires the "value" to be stated, and where the assets are situated. Bills receivable, for example, are never charged up to profit and loss by any banker or business man, until collection is hopeless; but until that time they appear on every trial balance as assets on their face value. However that may be, the legislature required a sworn statement of the capital actually paid in, and the value of the assets, and where the assets were; and we must either hold that "capital," in the statement, means only "capital actually paid in money," and that the words "bills receivable and other securities" of themselves amount to an averment that they are of the actual value there stated, or we must hold the statement materially deficient. We do not say that this defect in the tabulated statement may not be cured by proper averments in an affidavit attached thereto showing that the "capital" mentioned in the statement has been actually paid in money in good faith into the treasury of the bank, and that the assets there shown are of the value there stated, and are situated at a place or places named. The statute does not prescribe the form of these statements, and it is immaterial in what form the facts required are stated.

2. But these tabulated statements are not only not aided by the affidavit attached thereto, but are not "sworn statements." The affidavit is made by the managing agent at San Francisco, and is as follows: "William Lawson, being duly sworn, says he is the managing agent at San Francisco of the above-named bank, and that said bank has no cashier or secretary at such agency; that said bank is incorporated under the laws of Great Britain, has its principal place of business in the city of London, and carries on its business there and through numerous branches and agencies in Canada, the city of New York, and this city; and, further, that the accounts of the San Francisco agency are made up to the 30th June and 31st December in each year, and forwarded to the London office, where they are consolidated with the other accounts of the bank, and a general statement is prepared showing the entire assets and liabilities, which is sent to this office; that such general statements reach San Francisco about the middle of August and February in each year; that the foregoing is a correct copy of the last statement received. W. LAWSON. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of July, 1888. [Seal.] JAMES L. KING, Notary Public." It is nowhere intimated in this affidavit that any of the reports or accounts which are combined in the general statement were made under oath by any one, or that the general statement to which he attached his affidavit was the sworn statement of any officer or employe of the bank; nor does he swear that he believes it to be a true or correct statement. He only swears that it is a "a true copy of the last statement received." If the capital of the bank, at the time this statement was made, had been nil, and it had not been possessed of a dollar of available assets, and the agent had known it at the time the oath in question was taken, he could not be convicted of perjury. In Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. at page 66, the court had under consideration a similar statute, requiring the trustees of manufacturing corporations, at stated times, to publish and file a verified report, "which shall state the amount of capital and of the proportion actually paid in, and the amount of its existing debts." It was there said: "The reports should, in all essential particulars, comply with these statutes. The facts need not necessarily be stated with technical or grammatical precision and accuracy, but they must substantially appear, and be verified by the oath of the president and a majority of the trustees, and so distinctly stated that, if untrue, perjury could be assigned, or an action maintained by any one sustaining legal injury from the misstatement." It is true, as said by counsel for respondent, that our statute is in some sense penal, and should receive a liberal interpretation; but the fact that a statute is penal does not authorize the court to refuse to enforce it where the failure to comply with its provisions is, as in this case, palpable and material.

The fact that the San Francisco agent of the plaintiff could not personally know the truth of all the matters required to be embodied in the statements is not sufficient to relieve the plaintiff from such compliance as was within its power; and, if it be said that it is not possible for the plaintiff to comply substantially with the requirements of the statute, that would be conclusive against its right to maintain the action, as it is not in the power of the court to make an exception where none is made in the statute. As to the wisdom of this enactment, either as to its general purpose or the mode of its enforcement, we are not called upon to speak. The power of the legislature to make the enactment is not questioned, and our whole duty is to determine whether or not the law has been complied with, and, if it has not, to further determine the effect of such noncompliance upon the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action. In Bank v. Cahn, 79 Cal. 463, 21 Pac. Rep. 863, this court held that a failure on the part of the plaintiff to comply with the provisions of the act in question was a sufficient defense to the action. Counsel for respondent contends, however, that in the case above cited it was held that the publication and recording of these documents is mainly for the benefit of those locally interested, by giving information to them through local publication and recording, and that therefore the statute was not intended to have an extraterritorial effect; that in this case the bills of exchange sued upon were purchased by plaintiff at its agency at Vancouver in British Columbia; and that the "banking business," so far as these bills were concerned, was done in a foreign country. The record shows that these bills were purchased at plaintiff's Vancouver agency, and paid for by drafts drawn by that agency upon the San Francisco agency; that the bills were forwarded to the latter agency, and by it presented for acceptance, and after acceptance retained for collection. Upon this state of facts, respondent contends that it should not be deprived of the right "accorded to all foreigners, of pursuing their remedies against residents of this state upon personal contracts made out of the state." But the personal contract in this case sought to be enforced was a California contract, made here, and to be performed here. The Alaska Improvement Company, the defendant in the action, did not sell these bills to the plaintiff at Vancouver or elsewhere. Its only liability was that of a drawer and indorser, and not upon a supposed guaranty or other obligation, created by a sale of the paper in a foreign jurisdiction; nor can we see why the payment of the draft drawn by the Vancouver agency upon the San Francisco agency in payment for the bills of exchange, the presentation of them for acceptance, the demand of payment at maturity, and the protesting them for nonpayment, is not doing a banking business in the state of California. If John Smith, a resident of Vancouver, had there purchased them, and sent them to plaintiff's agency at San Francisco for the purposes above mentioned, would any one doubt that the same acts as those performed by the plaintiff in the case at bar were within the legitimate functions of a bank, were, indeed, the exercise of one of the most common and convenient functions of a bank, and which is everywhere regarded as "banking business?" In Bank v. Barling, 44 Fed. Rep. 641, an action against a stockholder of the Alaska Improvement Company upon his personal liability as a stockholder for these same bills of exchange, (cited by respondent's counsel,) the court held that the right of the plaintiff to maintain an action in the federal courts was not affected by the state statute under consideration here. Having so decided, the court also expressed the opinion in that case, in the circuit court, and also in the same case in the circuit court of appeals, (50 Fed. Rep. 260, 1 C. C. A. 510,) that, as the purchase of the bills of exchange occurred beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the state of California, the case was not within the statute; but this was clearly obiter dicta, and not authority upon the point here. But the whole question as to where the "banking business" was done, or the purchase was made, if material in any sense, is not conclusive. It is conceded that the plaintiff is, and during all the time covered by this transaction has been, doing a banking business in this state. The requirements of the statute are imperative. The penalty for a failure to comply with the statute is not that it shall not maintain or prosecute any action or proceeding upon or concerning a banking transaction done or performed by it within this state, but it is that "no corporation and no person or persons who fail to comply with the provisions, or any of the provisions, of this law, shall maintain or prosecute any action or proceeding in any of the courts of this state until," etc. The disability imposed by the statute as a consequence of the noncompliance is universal. There are no exceptions expressed in the statute, and none are implied. As to remedies, the lex fori governs, not the lex loci contractus. The penalty imposed by the statute for its violation affects the person or corporation by creating a personal disability, but in no wise affects the legality of business transacted. The view we have taken does not, as we think, conflict with the New York cases cited by the respondent, but, on the contrary, is clearly supported by them. Those cases proceed upon the theory that the duty of the corporation to make these reports is one which it owes to the public generally, for the protection of all persons who may have occasion to deal with it; that the duty is a corporate one; that the state confers upon the corporation valuable privileges, and, to carry out its policy, exacts the performance of specified duties which they must perform as the condition upon which they are entitled to enjoy these privileges. It does not affect the analogy between those cases and the case at bar that the penalty for a failure to comply with the statutory requirements was in some cases a pecuniary liability of the members of the corporation, and in others a forfeiture of the corporate franchise. The duty was the same, imposed for the same reason; the only difference being in the mode of securing its performance.

3. The statute doubtless intended that these statements should show the condition of the bank as of a time immediately or shortly preceding the publication of the statement, as otherwise there could be no object in requiring semiannual statements. We are not prepared to hold, however, that, where an exact compliance with the requirements of the statute as to the time of publication is impossible, a publication and recording, as soon thereafter as the same could reasonably be done, would not be a substantial compliance, and relieve the corporation from the penalty imposed by the statute. The legislature, in fixing the time for the publication of these statements, no doubt took into consideration the fact that banks usually prepare semiannual statements at the close of the months of June and December, and in naming January and July as the time of publication supposed that ample time was given for that purpose; and, as recent information as to the condition of banks and bankers is of more importance to the public than that the publication should be made in a particular month, that a publication in February and August would be a more substantial compliance with the statute than withholding the publication and recording until the recurrence of the next July or January. If this delay in the publication had been the only defect, we should have been inclined to hold that the delay was caused by the supposition that the publication could be legally made only in the months named in the statute, and was therefore intended in good faith as a compliance with its requirements. The conclusions at which we have arrived upon questions above considered render it unnecessary to consider other questions presented by appellant. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P Hoge, Judge.

Action by the Bank of British North America against the Alaska Improvement Company to recover on certain bills of exchange. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Smith & Pomeroy, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. This action is upon another bill of exchange drawn and indorsed by the defendant at the same time with those involved in case No. 14,198, between the same parties, and presents the same questions, and was submitted upon the same briefs. 31 Pac. Rep. 726. For the reasons given in the opinion in that case, No. 14,198, (this day filed,) it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

FREEL v. MARKET ST. CABLE RY. CO.

(No. 14,892.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1892.)

IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

1. In an action against a street railway for personal injuries, an employe of defendant, a witness for plaintiff, testified on cross-examination that he had obtained written statements from other employes as to the manner in which the injuries occurred, but that he did not know where these statements were. The witness identified a bundle of papers in the hands of defendant's counsel as the reports referred to, which plaintiff's counsel was permitted to examine. Subsequently another employe, who admitted that he made a written report to defendant in relation to this accident, was called by defendant, and testified to a material circumstance at variance with and contradictory to his report. Held, that plaintiff's counsel was entitled on demand to receive this report, which was lying on the table of defendant's counsel, and to introduce it in evidence for the purpose of impeaching such witness.

2. Where a physician, who was called as a witness by defendant, had obtained his knowledge of the case by prescribing for plaintiff, he was incompetent to testify, under Code Civil Proc. § 1881, which provides that a physician cannot, without the consent of his patient, testify as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe for her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Mary Freel against the Market Street Cable Railway Company for damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes and Frank Shay, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This was an action for damages for injuries done the plaintiff while endeavoring to get upon the car of the defendant. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff, from which, and an order refusing a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The only grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment and order are: "(1) That the court erred in compelling defendant's counsel to give to plaintiff's counsel certain written statements of employes of defendant in relation to the facts surrounding the occurrence which caused the plaintiff's injury, which statements were in the possession of the defendant's counsel, and which plaintiff's counsel desired to use as a foundation to impeach the testimony of Thomas Hurley, a witness for defendant. (2) That the court erred in refusing to allow Dr. Hutchins, a physician who had prescribed for plaintiff, to give evidence of information acquired by him of her physical condition, which was necessary for him to know in prescribing for her." The rulings of the court upon these matters were fully discussed on the motion for a new trial, and the learned judge of that tribunal gave reasons for his rulings in the premises, which read thus:

"This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff. The cause was tried, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $4,500, and the defendant now moves for a new trial. But two points are discussed in the defendant's brief in support of the motion: First, it is claimed that the court erred in requiring defendant's counsel to exhibit certain papers to the plaintiff; and, secondly, that the court should have admitted the testimony of Dr. Hutchins.

"1. As to the first point, it appears that during the cross-examination of James C. Gould, an employe of the defendant, and called as a witness for the plaintiff, he stated that he had obtained statements of the manner in which the plaintiff's injuries had occurred from the defendant's conductor and gripman; that he did not know where these statements were, but 'they may be upon the table, in front of defendant's counsel.' Thereupon plaintiff's counsel took from the table in front of defendant's counsel, and from among the papers of the latter, which he was using in the case, a number of papers fastened into one package or bundle, 'and held them up before the witness.' The witness then identified these papers as the reports made to defendant by these employes. The plaintiff's counsel then asked permission of defendant's counsel to take the papers, and the latter thereupon stated that he could examine them during the recess. Subsequently, when one of the defendant's employes (Thomas Hurley) was upon the stand and testifying on behalf of the defendant, he was asked if the plaintiff did not take hold of the hand rail of the car, just as the gripman was applying the grip,—a material circumstance. To this the witness answered, 'No.' He was then asked if he ever so stated, and he said he never did. Thereupon plaintiff's counsel requested of defendant's counsel the papers previously referred to, which he had allowed him to examine, stating that he desired to show by these papers that the witness upon the stand had formerly made a statement at variance with his present testimony in the last-mentioned particular, and that the papers to establish this fact were in the possession of the defendant's counsel. The latter denied the right of counsel to demand his private papers for cross-examination. The plaintiff's counsel then reiterated the demand, and offered to show by means of a paper then in the possession of the defendant's counsel—the paper which he had been allowed to examine—that the witness had made a statement at variance with the statement then made upon the stand, and that he desired to offer it for the purpose of impeaching the testimony thus given by him. Thereupon the witness was further questioned, and admitted that he did make a statement in writing to the company defendant in relation to this accident, and that this statement was sent to the office of the company; that the statement contained an account of how the accident happened, as the witness remembered it. Thereupon the court held that the plaintiff's counsel was entitled to the paper, whereupon Mr. Barnes handed the paper to Mr. Sullivan, plaintiff's counsel, and excepted to the ruling of the court. The witness was then confronted with the paper, and it did appear therefrom that he made therein a statement inconsistent with and contradictory to the testimony previously referred to and given by him upon this trial. Counsel, in support of the alleged error of the court in making this order, cites the case Stokoe v. Railway Co., (Minn.) 42 N. W. Rep. 482. There a release had been executed by the plaintiff to the defendant of the cause of action sued upon. The plaintiff requested defendant's counsel to produce the release. The defendant's counsel failed to do so, and the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the paper sought, but could offer parol evidence of the contents thereof. A similar doctrine was announced in Tannahill v. Coveney, 1 Hill, 33; Rhoades v. Selin, 4 Wash. C. C. 715. That decision is manifestly inapplicable to the case at bar. There a paper had been executed by the plaintiff himself, and delivered to the defendant, with the contents of which the plaintiff was presumed to be fully acquainted. Here, however, was a statement or account of plaintiff's injury prepared by Mr. Gould, an employe of the defendant, and signed by Mr. Hurley, another employe, and delivered into the custody of the defendant. This statement was in the possession of defendant's counsel upon the trial, and, indeed, was lying upon the desk before him when the demand in question was made. The plaintiff could not, in the nature of things, know the contents of this paper. It is not claimed that she had ever seen it, nor had it ever been in her possession. It was produced for the first time by defendant's counsel. To sanction the rule claimed by the defendant in this case would enable a litigant to suppress adverse evidence of the most important character. Here the plaintiff had a right to show, by way of the impeachment of the defendant's witness, that he had on another occasion made a statement inconsistent with his present testimony. The law provides that, where such statement is in writing, it must be shown to the witness, and an opportunity afforded to the latter to explain it. Upon defendant's theory, if he were permitted to retain this paper in his possession, so that the plaintiff's counsel could not, on cross-examination, show it to the witness for the purpose of impeaching him, it would be impossible, under similar circumstances, to impeach any witness. While a notice to produce a paper in certain cases is proper, yet in this instance the objection was not placed upon that ground. There was no necessity of a formal notice, inasmuch as the paper at the time the demand was made was lying in front of the counsel in the court room and upon the table. I am of opinion that no error was committed in this particular.

"2. As to the second point, the exclusion of the testimony of Dr. Hutchins, subdivision 4, § 1881, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a physician cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient. The plaintiff's mother testified on her behalf that after her daughter's injuries she called at the office of the railroad company, and requested them to furnish her daughter a doctor. She states that she met Dr. Hutchins in the office. The latter does not remember whether he met plaintiff's mother there or not. It appears, however, that he did call upon the plaintiff, and examined her. When interrogated as to what was said by him to her when he entered her sick room, he stated that he informed her that he had been sent there by the company. After he had made such examination as he thought proper, he returned a second time. When questioned whether he returned on the second occasion of his own motion or at the request of the plaintiff, he was uncertain. The plaintiff's testimony shows that Dr. Hutchins called upon her on several occasions, and prescribed for her. The doctor, when questioned upon this subject, failed to remember whether he did or did not prescribe for her. He was then asked by plaintiff's counsel this question: 'It was during this time that you were making these visits and prescribing for her that you obtained any knowledge that you have of her case?' And his answer was: 'Yes, sir; that is all, except conversations with Dr. McLean.' Upon this testimony the court held that he should not be permitted to testify. This ruling is attacked upon the authority of the case of State v. Depoister, (Nev.) 25 Pac. Rep. 1000. That was a criminal action,—an indictment for the rape of a child seven years old. The prosecution was conducted at the instance of the parents of the child, and in the course of the trial the people called as a witness a doctor called in by the parents to attend the child; and in response to questions propounded by the prosecution the doctor was permitted to testify as to information acquired by him in his professional capacity upon these visits. The facts there presented are entirely different from those disclosed in this case. The rule which excludes a physician from revealing the secrets of the sick chamber may not, in the nature of things, apply to criminal prosecutions. The interests of justice oftentimes in such cases unseal the doctor's lips. As was well said by the New York court of appeals, (Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 432,) the purpose of the law in excluding the testimony of the doctor in such cases never designed to shut out evidence necessary for the proof of guilt or the punishment of crime. It was never intended 'to protect the murderer rather than to shield the memory of the victim.' In civil cases, however, the rule is different. It will be observed that the rule of exclusion, by the precise terms of the statute, is confined to civil actions. The language of the statute (section 1881) is: 'A physician cannot be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired,' etc. And it will be observed that, while in the Penal Code the provisions of section 1881 in relation to parties prohibited from testifying is adopted as to a husband and wife, it is not in terms adopted as to any other of the professions or classes in section 1881 enumerated. In this case it appears that the plaintiff requested the defendant to furnish a doctor; that, in response to such request, Dr. Hutchins called upon her four or five times, and counseled with her as to her treatment, and prescribed for her. Under these circumstances, it seems to me he occupies a different position than if he had gone there originally upon the suggestion of the defendant, and stated to the patient that he came there solely and entirely at the request of the defendant, to ascertain the nature and character of her physical injuries, for the purpose of reporting them to the defendant. If he had confined his conduct to such examination and such report, he should have been permitted to testify. But in this case it appears from his own testimony that the information acquired by him was obtained while visiting and prescribing for her, and I therefore think that the proposed evidence was properly excluded. Motion for a new trial denied."

We are of opinion that the trial court was right in its views of the matters in dispute, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

Haynes, C. I concur.

BOSKOWITZ v. NICKEL. (No. 14,750.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1892.)

PARTNERSHIP—SETTLEMENT—AGREEMENT OF LIQUIDATION.

1. Where property is purchased out of the funds of an individual partner, but the other partner receives his share of the benefit, and it is considered by both a partnership transaction, the former is, notwithstanding an agreement of liquidation, wherein the entries in the books as they stood at the time were to be treated as correct, entitled to credit.

2. Where a partnership incurs an indebtedness with the express consent of a certain partner, and subsequent to an agreement of liquidation, wherein each partner was to satisfy one half the interest charged upon all indebtedness thereafter to be incurred, the interest on such indebtedness is a proper charge against the partner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. N. Rearden, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Boskowitz against J. Leroy Nickel for the settlement of partnership accounts. Judgment from which defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. Edmund Tauszky, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This is an appeal from a judgment settling the partnership accounts existing between these parties to the action, and it is insisted that the conclusions of law as to certain items of the account charged to appellant are not supported by the findings of fact. Difficulties having arisen between these parties as to the conduct of the business, and the firm having but one creditor, it was concluded to close out the business, and an agreement of liquidation was entered into with that object in view. This agreement contained the following provisions: "(4) The entries in the books, as they stand at the present time, shall be treated as correct, and as having been made after full discussion of all matters involved. (5) Interest on all overdue accounts becoming due to said Live Oak Distillery Company after this date shall be borne and paid equally between the parties hereto." The court held that an item of the account consisting of $666.31 should not be credited to appellant. This item was the value of one half of certain whisky, which formed a portion of the purchase price of a tract of land. The court found that this whisky was paid for from the personal funds of the appellant, and that the whole transaction was considered by both parties as a partnership matter, and they asked that it be settled as such. It is insisted by respondent that the fourth provision of the agreement of liquidation, wherein it is provided that the books, as they stand at the present time, shall be treated as correct, bars any credit to appellant as to this item. Such position is not tenable, and we hold to the contrary. Respondent recognized the transaction as a partnership matter, took title to one half the realty in his own name, had the full benefit of appellant's money, and should be charged with his share of the cost of the investment. There is nothing in the provisions of the contract quoted to prevent such an adjustment; neither are the books of the firm here referred to impeached by such a course.

The item of interest upon the amount due the partnership creditor was also a proper charge against respondent. The last indebtedness of the partnership to the creditor was created with the express consent of the respondent, and created subsequent to his agreement of 1888, which expressly provided that each party should satisfy one half of the interest charged upon all indebtedness due subsequent to the date of the agreement. Respondent's share of the office expenses is also a proper charge to be placed in the account. We find nothing in the agreement of May, 1888, to prevent the allowance of these items.

The findings in this case are an object of curiosity. They consist of a detailed statement of the evidence and the respective claims of the parties to the action, together with the views of the court upon matters of law. The practice is not one to be commended, and, if it is desirable in any case to place the evidence before this court, a motion for a new trial should be made. Let the cause be remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $802.62 from the date of the entry thereof, and in all other respects let the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1892.)

VENDOR'S LIEN—ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM—EXTINGUISHMENT.

Civil Code, §§ 1721, 1722, declare a sale to be a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration called a "price," one transfers to another an interest in property, and that the subject of sale must be property the title to which can be immediately transferred from vendor to vendee. Held, that an assignment to one's attorneys of a judgment thereafter to be recovered, in a certain action brought to enforce a vendor's lien, is not such a sale or assignment of the amount claimed as to extinguish the lien.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by E. B. Woolley against Isaiah Wickerd. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Horton, for appellant. Alfred Cooper, Frank H. Suffel, and J. W. Swanwick, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $400, balance of purchase money due for certain real property sold by him to the defendant, and to foreclose a vendor's lien on the property therefor. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, according to the prayer of his complaint, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Only two points are made by appellant. They are that the judgment should be reversed upon the grounds: (1) That the plaintiff by his delay lost his rights; and (2) that there was no vendor's lien which could be enforced in the action.

As to the first point, the court found, in effect, that the delay complained of was by agreement with and consent of the defendant, and therefore that any objection on account of the delay was waived. It would subserve no useful purpose to state the evidence bearing upon this question. In our opinion, it was fully sufficient to justify the finding, and hence this point cannot be sustained.

The second point is based upon the theory that the plaintiff sold and assigned his claim for the $400, unpaid purchase money, before the judgment was rendered, and that the lien was not assignable, and therefore ceased to exist when the sale was made, and could not thereafter be enforced in the name of the assignor or assignee. It is true that when the owner of real property parts with his title to it, and the purchase money is not paid, and no security is taken, the law implies a lien in his favor to secure its payment. Th lien does not arise from any agreement o the parties, but is the creature of equity and is established solely for the securit of the vendor. It is a privilege purely personal, and cannot exist in favor of an one but the vendor. It is not assignabl even by express contract, and the assignee of the right to recover the mone for which the land was sold cannot enforce the lien. Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 173 Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619, 25 Pac. Rep 919; Gessner v. Palmateer, 89 Cal. 89, 2 Pac. Rep. 608, and 26 Pac. Rep. 789. Th above are well-settled rules of law, an the question is, do they apply to thi case? The only proof that the plaintif had assigned his claim for the $400 wa that, after the action was commenced, h assigned to his attorneys all his right, title, and interest in any judgment that he might recover in the action. The Civil Code has the following provisions: "Sec. 1721. Sale is a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration called a 'price,' one transfers to another an interest in property. Sec. 1722. The subject of sale must be property the title to which can be immediately transferred from the selle to the buyer." When the alleged assignment was made, there was no judgment the title to which could be immediately transferred. The assignment, therefore, did not transfer the cause of action, and could, at most, operate only as an agreement to assign or transfer the judgment when recovered. This does not, in our opinion, bring the case within the rules of law above declared.

There is nothing in the other objections that the plaintiff had received the entire purchase price of his land, and that there was no lien because the parties had entered into a collateral agreement about another contract. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

APPEAL—MATTERS NOT APPARENT ON RECORD.

A finding by the trial court that plaintiffs' causes of action are barred by limitation is conclusive on appeal, where no exceptions were taken to such finding, and where the appeal was not taken within 60 days after judgment rendered.

Action by Elizabeth C. Richardson and others against Kate Dunne and Alice Dunne to quiet title to land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. W. S. Goodfellow, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to land. On the first trial there was a judgment for plaintiffs, from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appealed, and the judgment and order were reversed, and a new trial ordered. 82 Cal. 174, 23 Pac. Rep. 9. On the new trial, judgment passed for defendants, from which plaintiffs bring this appeal on the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions as to questions of law, but raising no questions of fact.

All the questions of law presented by the record on this appeal were decided on the former appeal; and the judgment on the new trial, from which this appeal is taken, appears to be, and is admitted by appellants' counsel to be, in strict accordance with the law of the case, as expressed on the former appeal. In his opening brief counsel for appellants says: "As the former decision of this court is the law of the case, right or wrong, so far as this court is concerned, we do not deem it proper to more than state our points and objections here, which we still believe well taken, but we realize that we must now take our chances in another forum to realize our expectations." In his closing brief, counsel makes a point on the finding by the court on the new trial that plaintiffs' causes of action were barred by sections 1573 and 1574 of the Code of Civil Procedure "as the same existed prior to the amendment thereof in the year 1880." Nothing as to this was decided on the former appeal; but the conclusion that the causes of action were barred does not appear to be an erroneous conclusion from other facts found, or in any way disclosed by the record; and since there is no exception to the findings, and as the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, the findings must be regarded as conclusive as to the facts. Besides, the judgment is well supported by other findings, regardless of the finding that the causes of action were barred. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

ASBILL v. STANDLEY, Sheriff.

(No. 14,250.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1892.)

SALE—DELIVERY—CHANGE OF POSSESSION—EVIDENCE OF GOOD FAITH—VERDICT—SUFFICIENCY.

1. In an action to recover certain mares and colts seized on an execution against plaintiff's husband, plaintiff testified that her husband sold her 16 mares in satisfaction of a debt. The mares were pastured on the husband's land prior to the sale, and were branded with his brand, but at the time of the sale they were brought to the corral, vented with the husband's brand, and then branded with plaintiff's brand. A bill of sale was also given, and they were then turned back on the range where they had been before, and cared for, at seasons requiring care, by men hired and paid by plaintiff. Held, that there was sufficient delivery and change of possession of the property.

2. Evidence as to whether plaintiff in 1889 gave in to the assessor the ranch as her property could not affect the validity of her purchase of the mares in question in the preceding July, and did not tend to show fraud in the transaction, and was therefore properly excluded.

3. A verdict will not be set aside on the ground that it is so uncertain that the judgment thereon cannot be executed, when such objection is presented on the judgment roll alone, and there is no bill of exceptions presenting the facts sustaining the contention of the uncertainty of the verdict, and when the answer of defendant sheriff also shows a familiarity with the property referred to in the verdict.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge.

Action in replevin by Mary Asbill against J. H. Standley, sheriff, for the recovery of certain mares. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Cooper, for appellant. J. L. Carothers, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal by defendant from a judgment rendered against him, and from an order denying a new trial. The plaintiffs brought replevin against the defendant for the recovery of certain mares and colts seized by the defendant as sheriff on an attachment issued against the property of the plaintiff's husband. The cause was tried before a jury, and the plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for return of part of the property, or for $1,600, the value thereof, if a delivery thereof could not be had.

We have looked carefully into the questions presented by the record upon the motion for a new trial, and find no error of which the appellant can complain. The instructions to the jury were full and clear, especially those given at the request of the defendant, and, as they do not involve any new principle of law, a discussion of them would serve no useful purpose.

The principal question in the case is the oft-recurring one as to what constitutes "an immediate delivery, and an actual and continued change of possession," and upon this question appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the verdict. The plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove that her husband was indebted to her, and sold her 16 mares in satisfaction of the debt. These mares were pastured on land of the husband prior to the sale, and were branded with his brand. That at the time of the sale they were brought to the corral, and vented with the husband's brand, and then branded with plaintiff's brand. A bill of sale of the mares was also given. They were then turned back on the range where they had been before, and cared for, at seasons requiring care, by men hired and paid by plaintiff. One of the means provided by statute for designating the ownership of stock, whether horses, cattle, sheep, or hogs, is by marks and brands; a mode indeed well calculated to indicate ownership, and which was in common use before the statute was enacted. If the husband's brand had been permitted to remain upon the mares without venting, it, under the circumstances shown, would have been taken as conclusive of his ownership, as in the case of Dean v. Walkenhorst, 64 Cal. 79, 28 Pac. Rep. 60, cited by appellant. The plaintiff's brand was different from that of her husband, easily distinguishable from it, and was not only notice of ownership, but almost the only indication of ownership possible in the case of "stock" animals which are not housed or commonly used. In McKee v. Garcelon, 60 Me. 165, also cited by appellant, the facts were materially different. There the cattle were sold by the husband to the wife. A bill of sale was given, and the cattle remained upon the husband's farm, where both resided, as before, where all the cattle were kept and used. No other act of delivery was made, so far as the report discloses, and we may therefore conclude they were not branded. Here there was not only a bill of sale, but the husband's vent brand was put on, as the statute requires, where branded animals are sold, and the purchaser's brand was also put on. It was properly said in the case last cited that "it is clear that there is the same necessity of a delivery where the parties to the sale are husband and wife that there is in other cases. For this purpose the wife sustains the same relation to the husband as any other person." In the case at bar there can be no question that there was a delivery of the property to the wife. It may have been fraudulent and without consideration, but those questions were submitted to the jury with proper instructions, and from the evidence they found that there was a consideration for the sale, and that it was not fraudulent. The sole question remaining, then, is as to the actual and continued change of possession; and the only ground upon which it could reasonably be claimed that there was not is that they were kept after the sale in the same place they were before. This court has repeatedly held that that is not conclusive. It is a circumstance which the jury may look to in determining that question, but it must be viewed in the light of other facts attending the transaction. Possession, after the transfer, by either party, is only evidence tending to show ownership, or a change of ownership. A change from the place where the property was kept before the sale may not be as conclusive evidence of a change of ownership as other visible indications upon the property itself, without a change of place; nor can the place where this property was kept by the plaintiff, after the transfer, be said to rebut or weaken the evidence shown by the change of brands, even if it was a place where she would naturally have kept similar property purchased from another. This property carried with it, wherever it might be, "the usual marks and indications of ownership," and were "such as to give evidence to the world of the claims of the new owner."

The evidence upon all points necessary to sustain the verdict was sufficient. The objections to questions put to the plaintiff upon cross-examination were properly sustained. Whether the plaintiff did or did not give in to the assessor in 1889 the ranch as her property could not in any manner affect the validity of her purchase of the mares in question the preceding July, and did not tend to show fraud in that transaction. The latter part of the question assumed what was not shown by the evidence, that she had made an affidavit as to her ownership of the ranch, and for that reason, as well as because it did not relate to nor affect the transaction involved in the litigation, was irrelevant. Nor can we perceive the materiality of the question as to how many sheep and cattle her husband had at the time of her marriage to him in the year 1887.

The only question arising upon the judgment roll is as to the sufficiency of the description of the property to which the jury found the plaintiff entitled. The verdict is as follows: "We, the jury, find a verdict for the plaintiff, Mrs. Mary Asbill, for the 16 mares bought of F. M. Asbill on the 23d day of June, 1888, with suckling colts, which we value at $675; also 12 two year old mules, valued at $560; also 4 two year old horse colts, valued at $140; also 4 one year old mule colts, valued at $160; also 3 one year old horse colts, valued at $65, the latter being the increase of aforesaid 16 mares,—being a sum total of $1,600 for value of said animals as a whole." We cannot say that the verdict is so uncertain that the judgment thereon cannot be executed. For aught that appears, the mares that were bought from F. M. Asbill, with their increase, are distinguishable from the other property sued for, and can be delivered by the defendant. All intendments are in support of the judgment, and, as this objection is presented upon the judgment roll alone, it was incumbent upon the appellant to present by bill of exceptions such facts as would sustain his contention that the verdict is so uncertain that the judgment thereon cannot be executed. We cannot say from its language that such uncertainty exists.

The answer of the defendant affirmatively alleged that "plaintiff claims title to the property described in the complaint, either directly or indirectly, from the said F. M. Asbill, her husband, to herself;" and also alleged "that on or about June 23, 1888, * * * all these things being well known to the plaintiff and to the said John B. Asbill, the said F. M Asbill transferred by bill of sale, without consideration, 16 head of horses, being part of the property described in the complaint, to the plaintiff herein, and at the same time transferred by bill of sale, without consideration, the remainder of said property described in the complaint to his son, John B. Asbill." The answer further alleged that the remainder of the property was transferred to the plaintiff by John B. Asbill, November 1, 1888. The appellant took all the property under an attachment, and justifies under his writ. His answer shows a familiarity with the property, which precludes the idea that he is unable, for want of a sufficient description of the property in the verdict and judgment, to comply therewith; and, unless we can see how the defendant may be prejudiced by the defective description, we are not permitted to reverse the judgment. Code Civil Proc. § 475. The discrepancy between the number of mares sued for and the number awarded plaintiff by the verdict was corrected in the court below, and no question is now made thereon. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

KREISS v. HOTALING. (No. 13,320.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1892.)

ARBITRATION — COMMON-LAW AWARD — ENFORCEMENT—STAY OF, AFTER VOID JUDGMENT.

1. Plaintiff and defendant agreed upon an arbitration stipulating that two arbitrators, without being sworn, might make an award, without set times or an appointed place for their proceedings; that they might obtain such information as they deemed best, anything in the Code of Civil Procedure to the contrary notwithstanding; that, if they failed to agree, they should choose a third, and the decision of a majority should be final; that the submission should be filed with the clerk, and entered as an order of the superior court; that after entry neither party should ask for any reduction, exception, new trial, or appeal therefrom, but it should have all the force of a final judgment of the court of last resort. Held that, since the parties intentionally ignored the material provisions of the statute on arbitrations, the submission, as a statutory submission, was void, and the award cannot be enforced as a judgment, though it is good as a common-law award, and the basis of an action.

2. The judgment being absolutely void, the court has no power to set it aside; but it may, to prevent annoyance which might be occasioned by the attempted execution of a void judgment, either stay or arrest the process.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

An agreement for a submission to an arbitration was entered into between L. Kreiss and A. P. Hotaling. An award was made in favor of Hotaling, which Kreiss moved to set aside. The motion was dismissed, and an order entered perpetually staying any proceedings under the judgment entered on the award. Hotaling appeals. For former report, see 28 Pac. Rep. 806. Affirmed.

A. N. Drown, for appellant. Henry E. Highton, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. A dispute having arisen between respondent and appellant as to the balance, if any, due from the latter to the former for certain work done by him in decorating appellant's dwelling house, a contract was entered into, by the terms of which they agreed to submit the matter in controversy to two arbitrators, who were authorized to choose an umpire in the event of their inability to agree. It was stipulated that the submission to arbitration should be filed with the clerk, and entered as an order of the superior court. The arbitrators were unable to agree upon an award, and Augustus Laver was chosen by them to act "as an umpire or third arbitrator." An award was filed April 21, 1888, in which the arbitrators found that appellant had overpaid respondent, and that he was entitled to have and recover from respondent the sum of $3,000. The award was entered in the judgment book by the clerk, who thereupon made up what he certifies to be the judgment roll, consisting of the agreement, stipulations extending the time in which the arbitrators should make the award, a notice and affidavit of Kreiss setting forth his objections to the entering of any award, and the award of the arbitrators. Respondent moved for an order setting aside the award, and granting a rehearing before the arbitrators. Thereupon the court made the following order, from which the appellant has appealed: "In this cause the motion of L. Kreiss, one of the parties above named, made June 11, A. D. 1888, for the purpose of vacating and setting aside the award in this proceeding, coming on regularly this day for hearing, the said L. Kreiss being represented by Henry E. Highton, Esq., his attorney, and A. P. Hotaling, the remaining party to said alleged arbitration, being represented by A. N. Drown, Esq., his attorney, it appearing to the court that the submission to arbitration filed herein on April 17, A. D. 1888, is not a statutory submission, under title 10, §§ 1281 to 1290 inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, it is hereby ordered that upon this ground, and for this cause, and for want of jurisdiction thereof, the said motion is now dismissed; and it is further ordered that the judgment entered in form in the said proceeding by the clerk of this court be, and all proceedings thereunder be, and the same hereby are, perpetually stayed. Affidavits of A. P. Hotaling, M. E. Knoph, Augustus Laver, and R. Blum read and filed in opposition to said motion."

It clearly appears from the provisions of this order that the court denied the motion of respondent to set aside the award, and, in lieu of the relief asked for, made an order staying all proceedings on the judgment entered by the clerk. Inasmuch as no motion was made to perpetually stay all proceedings under the judgment entered by the clerk, the matter must be treated as if such order had been made by the court of its own motion, and its action can be justified only upon the ground that the judgment entered by the clerk was absolutely void,—a mere nullity. In determining the question whether the judgment entered by the clerk was void, or merely irregular, it is necessary to consider the provisions of the Code relating to arbitration and award. If the agreement of submission under which the award was made was valid as a statutory submission, the court had no right to stay proceedings on the judgment, however erroneous the action of the arbitrators may have been. Relief from such irregularities can be had only in the manner and upon the grounds specified in sections 1287, 1288, Code Civil Proc. If the award, though not good under the statute, is valid as a common-law award, the court properly denied the motion to set it aside, because the effect of such an order as the motion called for would have been to declare it invalid for any purpose. Fink v. Fink, 8 Clarke, (Iowa,) 316. It has been held in many cases that statutory proceedings in cases of arbitration, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed. Monosiet v. Post, 4 Mass. 532; Mining Co. v. Pratt, 101 Mass. 359; Barney v. Flower, 27 Minn. 403, 7 N. W. Rep. 823; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 27 Ill. 160; Burnett v. Gould, 27 Hun, 366. But, as in this state the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, has been abrogated by the Code, it is sufficient if there is substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute.

In the agreement of submission, M. E. Knoph and Robert Blum were named as sole arbitrators, with power to determine which party was indebted to the other, and in what amount. It was stipulated that all of the requirements of section 1285 of the Code of Civil Procedure might be dispensed with, and that the arbitrators, without being sworn, might proceed to make an award, "without set times or an appointed place for their proceedings," and that they might obtain such information touching the subject-matter of the arbitration as they desired, and in such manner as they deemed best, "anything in the said Code of Civil Procedure to the contrary notwithstanding." It was further agreed that, in the event of the arbitrators named failing to agree, they should choose a third arbitrator or umpire, and the decision of the majority of the three should be final and binding. The agreement also provided that the submission should be filed with the clerk, and entered as an order of the superior court, and that, after a decision was entered upon the judgment book, neither of the parties thereto would ask for "any reduction, exception, new trial, or appeal therefrom, or from any part thereof," but that said decision should "have all the force and effect of a final judgment of the court of last resort, from which there shall be no appeal whatever; it being the object and intent of this agreement of submission to avoid the expenses and delay of a litigation in court." The agreement concluded with a stipulation that the submission should not be revoked by either party, but that the same should be final and irrevocable. Thus it is made clearly to appear that the parties intended to ignore nearly all of the material provisions of the statute relating to arbitrations. They expressly repudiated any intention of following its requirements, or of availing themselves of the machinery of the court to assist the arbitrators, or correct any errors of the latter. The submission, therefore, as a statutory submission to arbitration, is void; and the award cannot be enforced as a judgment, although it is good as a common-law award, and the basis of an action. The distinction between the case at bar and Williams v. Walton, 9 Cal. 146, on the question of the validity of the award as a common-law award, is clear. Morse Arb. pp. 44, 575; Fink v. Fink, 8 Clarke, (Iowa,) 313; Gibson v Burrows, 41 Mich. 713, 3 N. W. Rep. 200; Willingham v. Harrell, 36 Ala. 586; Coats v. Kiger, 14 Ind. 180; Strum v. Cunningham, 3 Ohio, 286; Myers v. Easterwood, 60 Tex. 107; Tynan v. Tate, 3 Neb. 388; Steel v. Steel, 1 Nev. 31; Fairchild v. Daten, 42 Cal. 129. In Halloran v. Bray, 29 Ga. 423, the court held that an umpire selected by two arbitrators chosen by the parties to the submission was not authorized to act, and there was no power in the court to make the award a judgment of the court. In Holdridge v. Stowell, 39 Minn. 360, 40 N. W. Rep. 259, the parties entered into an agreement, as in this case, to submit a certain matter in difference between them to the arbitrament of two persons named, and such other person as might be chosen by those two. The statute, it appears, did not authorize the two arbitrators named to choose a third. The award was set aside on the ground that it was invalid because the arbitrators were not chosen by the parties to the proceedings, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed. The court said: "It is conceded that the agreement was not good as a statutory arbitration, for the reason that the arbitrators are not all named in it." The judgment entered by the clerk being absolutely void because not supported by a valid statutory agreement of submission, we entertain no power of the court to set it aside, with or without a motion therefor. "If a judgment is absolutely void, and a mere nullity, of course it is no protection or justification to any person, and it is immaterial whether it be set aside or not." Black, Judgm. § 355. "A void judgment is, in legal effect, no judgment. By it no rights were divested. From it no rights can be obtained. Being worthless in itself, all proceedings founded upon it are equally worthless. It neither binds nor bars any one. All acts performed under it, and all claims flowing out of it, are void. The parties attempting to enforce it may be responsible as trespassers." 1 Freem. Judgm. § 117. "Each court has such general control of its process as enables it to act for the prevention of all abuse thereof. Hence it may, to prevent the annoyance which might be occasioned by the attempted execution of a void judgment, either stay or arrest the process." Freem. Ex'ns, § 32. In People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 405, 16 Pac. Rep. 197, Chief Justice SEARLS, speaking for the court, said: "A judgment which is void upon its face, and which requires only the inspection of the judgment roll to demonstrate its want of vitality, is a dead limb upon the judicial tree, which should be lopped off, if the power so to do exists." People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 607, 24 Pac. Rep. 311, cited by the appellant, is not in point. The judgment there considered was not void on its face. The order is affirmed.

WASHBURN v. KAHLER. (No. 14,446.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1892.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — ESTOPPEL — COMPLETION OF BUILDING—PROOF OF TIME.

1. A material man is not estopped from seeking to foreclose his liens for materials furnished by him to the contractor by reason of his giving a false receipt for the amount due him, to enable the contractor to obtain a payment from the owner, where the owner has paid out no money, and suffered no loss on account of such receipt.

2. A certificate dated January 23, 1889, was issued for the final payment on a building, in compliance with the building contract, which provided for a final payment to the contractor when all the work was complete, and accepted by the architect, provided that, before such payment should be made, the contractor should produce receipted bills for all material furnished by him, (the contractor.) Held, that a finding, based on the evidence of the certificate, that the building was completed on January 23d is erroneous, in that the issuance of such certificate was dependent both on the completion of the building and on the condition that receipts and bills for materials furnished should be presented to the architect, and because such receipts might have been presented to the architect long after the building was completed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by Albert Washburn against Elizabeth Kahler to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

William H. Jordan, for appellant. E. H. Wakeman, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien for materials furnished in the alteration of a building. It is insisted that the court committed error in not finding upon the matters set out in the answer in the nature of an estoppel. It appears that the payments were to be made to the contractor by the owner upon the certificate of the architect, and that the contractor obtained his last certificate from the architect, certifying that the final payment provided for under the terms of the contract was then due by presenting the receipted bills of plaintiff for the materials, upon which the present lien is based. Plaintiff furnished these receipted bills to the contractor, (although in fact the money had not been paid,) for the purpose of assisting him in securing his certificate from the architect. The answer for an estoppel alleges that defendant relied upon the truthfulness of the recitals contained in said receipted bills, and so relying paid to said Wells, the contractor, "a large part, if not all, of the money due to him" under said contract. Inasmuch as a large part of the contract price was due and payable under other certificates of the architect, the issuance of which in no manner depended upon or was effected by these falsely-receipted bills, the allegations of estoppel would hardly seem of sufficient importance to demand findings of fact. But, aside from such consideration, the court found that defendant paid no money upon this certificate of the architect, and such finding is fatal to the estoppel, conceding it to be well pleaded, for appellant suffered no damage by reason of respondent's conduct in this regard. We are unable to perceive any substantial variance between the pleading, the liens, and the proof.

Appellant contends that the liens were filed too late for the purpose of establishing the date of completion. Respondent offered in evidence the following certificate of the architect: "San Francisco, Jan. 23, 1889. Mr. H. Kahler—Dear Sir: Your building, No 11 Guerrero street, is now finished as per contract, dated Sept. 6th, 1888, by Ivory Wells, contractor, who is now entitled to the last and final payment, viz., $325. You will therefore please pay same to him, and this shall be your receipt therefor: provided, however, that all bills and receipts are satisfactory to you. [Signed] R. H. Daley." This certificate was issued in compliance with a provision of the contract that provided for a payment to the contractor, to wit, "when all the work is complete and accepted by the architect, $325: 'provided that at the making of any payment the said contractor shall produce receipted bills for all materials and labor furnished by him [the said contractor] to the architect before any certificate is given for the said payment.'" It is thus apparent that the date of the certificate of the architect is no evidence of the time of the completion of the building. Such was neither its object nor purpose. The certificate was provided for in the contract for the purpose of indicating when the final installment was payable to the contractor. The time for the payment of this installment was dependent upon the issuance of the certificate, and the issuance of the certificate was dependent, not alone upon the completion of the building, but also upon the condition precedent that receipted bills should be presented to the architect. The receipted bills may have been presented upon the day of completion, but their presentation may have followed weeks subsequent to that event, and from the face of the certificate it is impossible to determine the date of completion. The contractor, who was offered as a witness for the respondent, testified upon cross-examination that the building was completed January 13th. This evidence, taken in connection with the architect's certificate, comprises all that was presented upon this matter, and upon such a state of facts the finding that the building was completed upon the 23d day of January must be set aside, as without support in the evidence. It follows that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

BREEZE et al. v. BROOKS et al. (No. 14,650.)

JUDGMENT LIEN—LAND OF THIRD PARTY IN DEBTOR'S NAME.

In an action to subject certain lands owned by defendant's brother to the payment of an account due plaintiffs from defendant, it appeared that the lands were in defendant's name, and in his possession, and that plaintiffs relied on defendant's statement that he was the owner of the land, in giving him credit, but there was no finding that defendant's brother had any knowledge that defendant was obtaining credit with plaintiffs on the faith of his apparent ownership of the land. Held, that a judgment refusing to subject the land to the payment of plaintiffs' claim was justified.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; F. E. Spencer, Judge.

Action by Charles K. Breeze and others against John Brooks and others to subject certain lands of Patrick Brooks to the payment of a debt due plaintiffs from defendant John Brooks, his brother. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

For former reports, see 11 Pac. Rep. 885, and 9 Pac. Rep. 670.

Geo. W. Fox and Geo. C. Ross, (S. F. Lieb, of counsel,) for appellants. E. B. Mastick and W. C. Belcher, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to subject certain lands of Patrick Brooks, which he had allowed to stand of record in the name of his brother John, to their claim as creditors of John, upon the ground that the subsequent transfer from Patrick to John was fraudulent, and with intent to defraud them as creditors. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed upon the judgment roll alone, claiming that, upon the findings of fact, judgment should have been given in their favor. Upon a former appeal herein, (71 Cal. 169, 9 Pac. Rep. 670, and 11 Pac. Rep. 885,) the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was reversed upon the ground that the findings did not sustain it, and the action was remanded for a new trial. Unless, therefore, the facts now presented are materially different from those presented upon the former appeal, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

The findings of fact which were before the court on the former appeal are substantially set forth in the report of the case, and were again made by the court upon the subsequent trial, and in the same language as before. In addition thereto the court has now found that, during the time that the legal title to the land stood in John, he was generally reputed and believed in his neighborhood, and among his neighbors, and by the community generally, to be the legal and equitable owner of the land; that the deed to him was delivered to him in person by the grantors, and was taken by him to the recorder's office for record, and was recorded at his request; that, during the time that it stood of record in his name, it was assessed to him and in his name, and that he had paid certain taxes thereon; that in the year 1869 he commenced an action against the Spring Valley Waterworks for damages, which, after having been partly tried, was compromised between the parties without going to judgment, under which the defendant paid him certain moneys; that at the trial thereof Patrick testified as a witness in his favor, and it was stipulated by counsel for the respective parties in open court, and in the presence of Patrick, that John was the owner in fee of the land. The court also finds certain details of the transactions between John and the plaintiffs, by which he incurred the indebtedness for which he gave them the promissory note on which they recovered the judgment they are now seeking to enforce, and that during all this time the only information which Patrick had that John was obtaining credit from the plaintiffs, or dealing with them, was that he was informed of an error which the plaintiffs made in September, 1872, by charging two items, amounting to about $20, to John, instead of to himself, and of the subsequent correction of the error by transferring the items to his own account.

A comparison of the facts found at the last trial with those before the court on the former appeal shows that they do not take the case out of the principles then laid down, or call for the application of any different principles. It was then held necessary that the plaintiffs, in order to entitle them to a recovery, should show that Patrick was in some way privy to John's obtaining credit from them, or that in giving such credit they relied upon some affirmative statement or act of Patrick, other than his permitting the title to stand of record in John's name; and that the mere fact that Patrick allowed the title to the land to stand of record in the name of John was unavailing to the plaintiffs, unless they could establish, to the satisfaction of the court, that they relied thereon as an inducement to give credit to John. The court says in its opinion: "The findings negative the idea that the plaintiffs, in giving credit to John, relied on any statement of Patrick that John owned the land; nor is it intimated that they examined the records of deeds, or that of the partition suit, to find out what they disclosed in reference to John's title, or relied on them in any way to induce the credit which they extended to John. They seem to have relied on the facts that John lived on the land, claimed it in his conversations with them as his, and that he was insolvent, and Patrick knew it; and that is all which it is there claimed even tends to show Patrick as having been privy in any way to John's obtaining credit from the plaintiffs. * * * So far as the findings disclose, Patrick did no act to induce creditors of John to believe the land was John's, save that he allowed the title, upon the record, to stand in John's name, which record these creditors never examined. It does not appear that Patrick had any knowledge that John was getting credit from any one upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the land. There was, therefore, on the part of the former, no such carelessness or negligence as amounted to even the smallest degree of turpitude; and in such a case we understand the authorities all to agree that one cannot be estopped to set up that which, but for such act, would be a good legal title to land." Instead of there being affirmative findings in their favor, as in the opinion upon the former appeal was held to be essential to a recovery by them, the findings now presented fail to show that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the relation held by John to the land, or of his acts in reference thereto. It is not found that they knew that he was generally reputed or believed to be the owner, or had any information of the litigation between him and the Spring Valley Waterworks, or of what was done by him or by Patrick during that litigation; and it cannot, therefore, be said that it appeared to the trial court that they in any way relied thereon in giving credit to John. On the contrary, the court finds that the plaintiffs believed the statements of John, that he was the owner of the land, and knew that he was in exclusive possession of the property, "and relied on said statements and were wholly ignorant of the fact that he (John) was not the equitable owner thereof, or that said Patrick had or claimed to have any interest therein, and solely by reason of said statements, apparent ownership, and belief, gave said John said credit, and would not have given him credit except for said statement, belief, and apparent ownership." Neither do the facts found by the court show that Patrick had any knowledge that John was obtaining credit with the plaintiffs upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the land. The court does not find that he had any such knowledge, and its finding that he knew of the charge to him of certain items which should have been charged to himself, and the subsequent correction of the mistake, cannot be construed as equivalent to a knowledge that they were charged to John upon any faith in his ownership of the land. We are not at liberty to assume, as is urged on behalf of appellants, that because of the relation between Patrick and John, and of the knowledge which Patrick had of John's relation to the land, and his knowledge that he was dealing with the plaintiffs, he must have known that they gave him this credit upon their faith in his apparent ownership of the land. The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon; and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred, which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment. The trial court, in this case, had before it the opinion of this court on the former appeal, and must be deemed to have made its findings of fact from the evidence before it, in the light of what was then held to be essential to a recovery by the plaintiffs. Its failure to find from the evidence the facts then declared essential to a recovery, as well as its own construction of the findings, which it has made by rendering a judgment thereon in favor of the defendants, must be regarded as its own conclusion that the evidence was insufficient to justify such findings as, under the former opinion of this court, would authorize a decision in favor of the plaintiffs. The judgment is affirmed.

SALINAS CITY BANK v. DE WITT et al.

(No. 14,314.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1892.)

PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE.

Declarations by a person that he and W. are partners are not admissible against W. to establish the facts of partnership, if made in his absence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action by the Salinas City Bank against George W. De Witt and William De Witt. Judgment for plaintiff. William De Witt appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Geil and H. V. Morehouse, for appellant. N. A. Dorn and Parker & Nougues, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks to establish a joint liability against the defendants for the amount of an overdraft at its bank. The making of the overdraft was by the defendant George De Witt, and the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant William De Witt liable therefor by showing that a partnership relation existed between the two. The complaint, which is unverified, alleges "that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff on account of moneys had and received by them from the plaintiff at their special instance and request, in the sum of $865;" and "that the amount of the said indebtedness is the balance of an account had by the defendants with the plaintiff wherein the defendants deposited money with the plaintiff and drew money from the plaintiff, and the said sum is the balance of the said account, consisting of what is called an 'overdraft,' and interest thereon." To this complaint the defendant William De Witt made a general and specific denial. The case was tried by the court; judgment was rendered against him, from which, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed.

It was essential for the plaintiff, in order to fix the liability of William for the acts of George, to show that a relation of partnership existed between them, or that by virtue of some express or implied authority George was the agent of William in making the overdraft; and in order to establish this relation several witnesses were permitted to testify on behalf of the plaintiff to certain declarations made by George, in the absence of William, that William and he were partners. The appellant duly objected to this testimony, but his objections were overruled, and these rulings of the court are now assigned as error. The admissibility of such evidence was before this court in an action against the same defendants, (Vanderhurst v. De Witt, 95 Cal. 57, 30 Pac. Rep. 94,) and it was there held to be a settled rule of law that such evidence is incompetent to establish the fact of partnership; and upon the authority of that case the judgment and order denying a new trial herein must be reversed.

The respondent appears to concede that the admission of this testimony was error, but urges that it was an immaterial error, for the reason that there was other evidence before the court sufficient to sustain its finding upon this issue. We cannot, however, accede to this proposition. The fact that appellant held such relation was controverted both by the pleadings and at the trial, and the evidence offered in support thereof, aside from the acts and declarations of George, was chiefly circumstantial, or of matters from which such relation might be inferred. The appellant himself testified: "I know George De Witt. The only relation I ever had with him was I let him have my threshing machine, machinery, horses, plows, wagons, harness, etc., and he was to carry on the threshing and farming business, and pay all expenses, and pay me for the use of my property one half the net proceeds." If this was true, then, as was held in Vanderhurst's Case, the relation of partnership did not exist between them. In any view of the case, there was a very sharp conflict of testimony upon the issue, and "in such a case all the evidence upon that point becomes material, and the introduction of any incompetent testimony is presumed to cause an injury to the opposite party, and we cannot determine the weight which the court below gave to this testimony in reaching its conclusion upon this controverted point." Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 383, 26 Pac. Rep. 206. The fact that the court received the testimony after proper objection had been made to its introduction raises the presumption that it believed it entitled to consideration, and we must assume that it did give it some weight in determining the issue. As was said in Smith v. Westerfield, supra: "If the respondent believed that this testimony of the witness was unnecessary for the purpose of establishing its case, it should have declined to introduce it after the objection had been made thereto. It cannot now, after insisting upon a ruling in its favor, and introducing the testimony, say that the error was harmless." The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

HAYNES v. BACKMAN et al. (No. 19,000.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1892.)

FORECLOSURE—SETTING ASIDE OF SALE—DISCRETION.

In a proceeding to set aside a foreclosure sale on a showing promptly made, it appeared that the property had brought a very inadequate price; that the deputy having the matter in charge had been asked to bid for the mortgagee in the latter's absence, but had neglected to do so; that the mortgagee's intention to bid was known to the purchaser; and that the mortgagee could not collect any of the deficiency from the mortgagor. Held, that the court might properly set aside the sale.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Proceeding by Mary E. Haynes against Peter Backman and others and the Los Angeles Terminal Land Company to set aside a sale of property made under a mortgage foreclosure. Order setting aside the sale. The defendant land company appeals. Affirmed.

Burnett & Gibbon, for appellant. Geo. I. Cochran, Henry Bleecker, and John T. Jones, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal by a purchaser at a sale of property under foreclosure of a mortgage from an order setting aside the sale. From the affidavits used on the motion, the court below may have believed the following to be the facts in reference to the sale: The amount found due on the mortgage, including costs, was about $1,600; that the land was worth that sum; that plaintiff had instructed her attorneys to attend the sale, and in case no one bid more, or an equal sum, to bid for her the amount of the judgment and costs; that one of her attorneys, Cochran, was intending to carry out this instruction, and informed the deputy sheriff who had the matter in charge of that fact, and instructed the deputy, in view of the fact that the sale was fixed for Monday, which was law day, when he might be busy in court, that in case he was not present to bid for his client the amount due on the judgment; that the purchaser, or its agent, was well aware of plaintiff's intention to bid the full amount of the judgment; that the defendant, who joins in the motion, inquired of plaintiff's attorney as to his intention with reference to the sale, and on being informed that he would bid the amount of the judgment, and that there would be no judgment for deficiency, relying upon the promise, made no effort to have the property bring a larger sum, being satisfied if the property should pay the debt; that the sale was advertised for October 19, 1891, at 12 M.; that on that morning Cochran was actually engaged in the argument of a demurrer, and was delayed by this business a few moments after 12 o'clock, but still hurried to the place of sale, expecting to be in time; but, although he arrived within 20 minutes after 12, the property had been struck off to appellant for $500, and the amount paid to the sheriff. On the same day, an order to show cause on the next day why the sale should not be set aside was obtained, and served on the purchaser. On the hearing, which by consent was adjourned for five days, the order appealed from was made. It also appeared that plaintiff would be unable to collect any deficiency from the defendant. Some of these facts were controverted, but it devolves upon the appellant to show error. Unless, therefore, we can plainly see that the conclusion reached by the court, from the affidavits, was erroneous, we cannot interfere with its discretion. It is true it has been held that mere inadequacy of price will not justify a court in setting aside a sale where all the proceedings are regular and free from fraud or mistake. Still, in numerous cases upon this subject, that fact figures as an important factor. Here the attorney had left with the deputy sheriff his bid. Such course is not unusual, and, if the deputy was unwilling to accept the bid in that form, he ought to have informed the attorney of such fact, in which case, very likely, knowing that he might be detained, he would have had some person present to bid for him. Setting aside the sale so promptly will harm no one except a purchaser who insists upon an unfair advantage obtained by this excusable neglect on the part of plaintiff's attorney, while the client will be irreparably injured if the sale is allowed to stand. Greater delinquency has been found excusable by this court in many cases. Buell v. Emerich, 85 Cal. 116, 24 Pac. Rep. 644; Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. Rep. 332. As said in Buell v. Emerich, supra, very great discretion is conceded to the trial court in regard to these matters, in the interests of justice. We cannot say that such discretion has been abused in this case. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

APPEAL—RECORD—JUDGMENT AGAINST PERSONS NOT PARTIES.

1. Questions which can be determined only from the evidence are not reviewable on an appeal taken upon the judgment roll alone.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Proceeding by Mary E. Haynes against Peter Backman and others and the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. The defendant railway company appeals. Affirmed.

Burnett & Gibbon, for appellant. Geo. J. Cochran, Henry Bleecker, and John T. Jones, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment, without a bill of exceptions. Two points are made:

1. The appellant purchased from the mortgagor, subsequent to the mortgage, a strip of land, part of the mortgaged premises, for a right of way. In its answer, appellant asked to have the land divided and sold in parcels, the division to be as divided by the railroad, and that the strip occupied by the appellant should be sold only in case sufficient money could not be realized for the residue to pay the mortgage. This was not done. There being no bill of exceptions, and no findings, we do not know that the appellant acquired title to the strip of land by conveyance from the mortgagor after the mortgage was given, or that a sale in separate parcels can be had to advantage, or without danger of depreciating the price which might be realized to the extent of preventing plaintiff from realizing the amount of her mortgage. These were questions to be determined from the evidence, and on the appeal upon the judgment roll alone we cannot review the action of the court.

2. The appellant was not named in the complaint as a defendant, but the Los Angeles, Pasadena & Glendale Railway Company was. The judgment is not against the last-named company, but is against appellant. The complaint was not amended so as to include the appellant. It is contended that the judgment is irregular, under the rule laid down in McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 570, and Campbell v. Adams, 50 Cal. 203. Though not named as a party, appellant appeared and filed an answer, in which it is stated: "Comes the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, and leave of court having first been obtained to appear and defend said action," etc. The answer then proceeds to aver a sale and conveyance of a portion of the mortgaged premises by the mortgagor, after the execution of the mortgage, to the other corporation named in the answer; that subsequent to that conveyance the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company had consolidated with the other named corporation, under the name of the "Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company." The judgment recites that appellant "has been duly made a party defendant to this action by order of the court." Evidently this means that appellant was made a party as successor in interest to the other named defendant. As a matter of fact, the answer, if true, shows the identity of appellant with the corporation defendant named. There is no injurious error in this.

The judgment should be affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. The motion of appellant to modify the judgment rendered in this case on November 29, 1892, by directing the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings, is denied. We did not in the opinion filed on that date intend to be understood as saying that upon proof of the single fact that the parties to the deed of September 17, 1879, adopted the description which it contains by mistake, the defendant would be entitled to a judgment in the action, nor do we think the language used by us can be so construed. The question as to what facts should be alleged in order to constitute an equitable defense to the action growing out of such mistake, if made, was not before us, and it was not our purpose to give a complete outline of all that such a pleading should contain. The sufficiency of such an answer must be determined by the court when it is filed.

HOLMES v. SOUTH PAC. COAST RY. CO.

(No. 14,880.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 12, 1893.)

Railroad Companies — Injury to Person on Track—Evidence—Contributory Negligence.

1. Plaintiff's intestate, while waiting for defendant's train, was walking up and down between the sidewalk and the track. His back was towards the train as it approached, and when the whistle sounded eight feet away from him he stepped on the track, and was struck by the engine. The bell was rung as the train approached, but no whistle sounded except as above stated. Deceased had good sight and hearing. It was daylight, and he could have seen the train in ample time to escape injury, if he had looked in the right direction. Held, that plaintiff was guilty of such negligence as to prevent recovery.

2. The engineer was not negligent in not earlier blowing the whistle, as he might reasonably believe that deceased knew of the train's approach, and would move away from the track in time to escape injury.

3. The rule that the negligence of the plaintiff will not prevent his recovery if, notwithstanding such negligence, the injury could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the defendant at the time, does not apply where both persons are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them.

4. Where defendant company had for two years before the accident run its train on the left-hand track, it was not error to refuse to allow plaintiff to show that, except in the case of this road, it was the "universal" custom in operating double-track roads to run trains on the right-hand track.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by one Holmes, administratrix, against the South Pacific Coast Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George Lezinsky, for appellant. Frank Shay, for respondent.

De Haven, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying her motion for a new trial. The action is to recover damages against the defendant for its alleged negligence in causing the death of George A. Holmes, Jr., of whose estate the plaintiff is administratrix.

The evidence given upon the trial shows that defendant was on May 19, 1889, operating a double-track railroad on Encinal avenue, in the town of Alameda, and on that day the decedent was killed by one of its moving trains at Webster station, on that avenue or street. The station consisted of a house or shed built upon the sidewalk, and the space between the sidewalk and defendant's track was three feet in width, and the sidewalk was only two or three inches higher than the roadway between it and the railroad track. The deceased, at the time of the accident, was waiting for one of defendant's trains, intending to take passage thereon for San Francisco, and he was the holder of a ticket which entitled him to do so. While thus waiting for the train, which was soon expected, he walked up and down near the station, on the roadway between the sidewalk and the railroad track, and in going one way was facing in the direction from which the expected train was to come. He had been thus walking for from five to eight minutes before the accident, and had just turned his back upon the approaching train when it came in sight of others at the station; but he continued to walk along between the sidewalk and the track, and did not look around, or seem to be aware of the train which was coming behind him. The bell upon the engine was kept ringing all the time as the train approached, but no alarm whistle was sounded until the engine was within six or eight feet of the decedent. When the alarm whistle was sounded, deceased stepped partly upon the track, and was struck by the engine. It does not appear very clearly just when the deceased was first seen by those in charge of the train, but he might have been seen by them, if they had looked towards him as soon as the train came in sight of the station, a distance of 400 or 500 feet. The fireman was the only one on the train who saw him, and he testified that he did not give the danger signal to the engineer until just before the deceased was struck. When the engineer received this signal he blew the whistle, reversed the engine, and did all that was possible to stop the train. It also appears from the evidence that deceased had good sight and hearing. The accident occurred in the daytime, and the train could have been seen by deceased in ample time for him to have escaped injury, if he had looked in the direction from which it came, after it was in sight of the station.

Upon these facts it is clear to us that the judgment must be sustained, as the deceased, in walking where he did, in dangerous proximity to the track of defendant, without looking or listening for the approach of the train for which he was waiting, and finally stepping partly upon the track in front of the moving engine, was guilty of such contributory negligence as defeats plaintiff's right to recover in the action. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a clearer case of contributory negligence upon the part of a person injured than is presented by the evidence in this case. A railroad track upon which trains are constantly run is itself a warning to any person who has reached years of discretion, and who is possessed of ordinary intelligence, that it is not safe to walk upon it, or near enough to be struck by a passing train, without the exercise of constant vigilance, in order to be made aware of the approach of a locomotive, and thus be enabled to avoid receiving injury; and the failure of such a person, so situated with reference to the railroad track, to exercise such care and watchfulness, and to make use of all his senses in order to avoid the danger incident to such situation, is negligence per se. The following are a few of many cases which might be cited to sustain this proposition: Harlan v. Railway Co., 64 Mo. 480, on rehearing, 65 Mo. 22; Railroad Co. v. Depew, 40 Ohio, St. 121; Kelley v. Railroad Co., 75 Mo. 138; Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. Rep. 518.

It is argued, however, by plaintiff that the engineer or defendant was guilty of negligence in not blowing the alarm whistle sooner, and thus giving more timely warning to deceased of his peril, and that defendant is for this reason liable, notwithstanding the negligence of deceased in placing himself in the dangerous position in which he was walking. If it be assumed that the deceased was actually seen by those in charge of the train before the whistle sounded, still we do not think, under the facts here appearing, that the engineer was guilty of any negligence in not sounding the alarm whistle before he did. In addition to the noise which was made by the moving train, the usual signal of its approach was given by ringing the bell, and, as the deceased was a man of mature years, and nothing to indicate that he was not able to take care of himself,—as he was, in fact,—the engineer might reasonably believe that he knew of its approach, and would, in obedience to the ordinary instinct for self-preservation, move away from the track before being overtaken by the engine. Railroad Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 279. But if it should be conceded that it was a question for the jury to determine whether the engineer, in view of all the facts shown, did exercise the proper degree of care to avoid injury to deceased, still the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted, as the question of defendant's negligence was immaterial, in view of the negligent conduct of the decedent. Harper v. Railway Co., 32 N. J. Law, 88; Delaney v. Railway Co., 33 Wis. 67. It is undoubtedly a well-settled principle of law that, even though a person has by his own negligence placed himself in a position of danger, it is still the duty of others who discover him in that situation to observe care in order to avoid injuring him; and it has often been held that a failure to discharge this duty will render a defendant liable for damages resulting from such neglect of duty, notwithstanding the previous negligence of the person injured. Needham v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 409; Meeks v. Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 513; Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 545; Adams v. Ferry Co., 27 Mo. 95; Austin v. Steamboat Co., 43 N.Y. 75; Railway Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420. But this rule is only properly applied in those cases where the negligence of the person injured was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the injury; that is, where the negligent acts of the parties were independent of each other, the act of the person injured preceding that of the defendant. O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552; 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1157; Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455. In the case of O'Brien v. McGlinchy, just cited, the supreme court of Maine say: "But in cases falling within the foregoing description, where the negligent acts of the parties are distinct and independent of each other, the act of the plaintiff preceding that of the defendant, it is considered that the plaintiff's conduct does not contribute to produce the injury if, notwithstanding his negligence, the injury could have been avoided by the use of ordinary care at the time by the defendant. This rule applies usually in cases where the plaintiff or his property is in some position of danger from a threatened contact with some agency under the control of the defendant, when the plaintiff cannot and the defendant can prevent the injury. * * * But this principle cannot govern where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them." This, we think, may be regarded as a correct statement of the law upon this point, and as furnishing a clear and definite rule by which to determine in any case whether or not the negligence of the person injured may be said in a legal sense to have contributed to such injury; and when we apply this rule to the case here it is at once seen that, even if it should be conceded that there was negligence upon the part of the defendant in its management of the train at the time of and just preceding the accident, still the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, as such accident could not have occurred without the concurrent and active negligence of the deceased at the time. The defendant was not the only one who could have prevented the accident, but, on the contrary, if the deceased had himself used ordinary care at the time, he could not possibly have been harmed by defendant's locomotive, which was confined to the narrow track upon which it ran. Up to the very moment that he was struck by the engine it was within his power to escape the injury which he received by simply moving to a place of safety upon the sidewalk, and he would have realized the necessity for such action on his part but for his own negligence at the time in not looking or listening for the approach of the train.

The court did not err in sustaining the objection to the offer of plaintiff to show that with the exception of this particular road, it is the "universal" custom in the operation of double-track railroads to run trains upon the right-hand track. It seems that the defendant ran its trains upon the left-hand track at the time and place of the accident, and had been doing so for two years; and it is argued by plaintiff that this offered evidence would have a tendency to show that deceased was not negligent in being near the track where he was hurt, and in not watching for the train, as he may have thought it would come upon the other track. The fact thus sought to be proven was clearly irrelevant. The road had been operated in the same manner as upon the day of the accident for the two years preceding, and the liability of defendant in this action cannot be made to depend upon the question whether deceased did or did not know of the way in which it operated its road. Judgment and order affirmed.

ROGERS v. DUFF et al. (No. 19,045.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1892.)

Pleading—Uncertainty—Issues not Found—Appeal.

1. A complaint alleging that plaintiff, a broker, at the request of defendants, advanced $697.69 for them in the purchase of produce; that defendants promised to pay the same; and that they have failed to do so, though requested by plaintiff,—is not demurrable, as being uncertain, on the ground that it cannot be determined from the complaint whether the action was brought for the sum of $697.69 or to recover the price of produce sold and delivered, Code Civil Proc. § 454, providing that a party need not set forth in his complaint the items of an account therein alleged.

2. A complaint alleged that defendants were indebted to plaintiff for "commissions" on the purchase by plaintiff for defendants of various articles of produce. Held, that a finding that defendants were indebted to plaintiff "for labor performed for them at their request" is not a finding outside of the issue, in that the allegation in the complaint necessarily implies that plaintiff performed services, i. e. labor, for defendants in purchasing such articles.

3. Error cannot be predicated on a failure to find on issues raised by the pleadings, where no evidence has been introduced as to such issues.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by Rogers against Duff and others on an account. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellants. C. A. Starke, for respondent.

Sharpstein, J. The plaintiff states two causes of action in his complaint. Defendant Kitzmiller demurred to the complaint on the grounds that it is uncertain and ambiguous, because it cannot be ascertained from it whether the action is brought for the sum of $697.69, or any sum of money, advanced for the use and benefit of defendants, or whether said action is brought to recover for the price of beans sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants, and for commissions on various articles of farm produce, and for money paid out for defendants' use. The demurrer was overruled, and that ruling is one of the errors relied on by appellants.

The first cause of action is stated in the complaint in the following language: "That plaintiff is, and at all times hereinafter mentioned has been, doing business as a broker and buyer on commission in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California; that as such broker, between the 26th day of July, 1889, and the 29th day of March, 1890, plaintiff advanced in Santa Barbara, in the county and state aforesaid, the sum of six hundred and ninety-seven dollars and 69-100 dollars for defendants, at defendants' instance and request, in the purchase of certain Lima and other beans, and other products of California; that defendants promised to pay the same to plaintiff, and, although often requested so to do, defendants have neglected, and still neglect, to pay the same to plaintiff, or any part thereof." We discover no uncertainty or ambiguity in this language. "It is not necessary for a party to set forth in a pleading the items of an account therein alleged, but he must deliver to the adverse party, within five days after demand thereof, in writing, a copy of the account, or be precluded from giving evidence thereof." Code Civil Proc. § 454. We think plaintiff set forth all that he was required to under this provision of the Code, and this applies as well to the statement of the second cause of action as to that of the first. The demurrer was properly overruled.

After the demurrer was overruled, the defendant Kitzmiller filed an answer to the complaint, in which he denied that he or the firm of P. Duff & Sons is indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever, and for cause of counterclaim alleges that plaintiff is indebted to defendants on breach of contract in not delivering Lima beans to defendants according to a contract between plaintiff and defendants. After hearing the evidence and arguments of the respective parties, the cause having been submitted to the court for decision, the court found "that defendants, at the date of the commencement of this action, and ever since, have been, and still are, indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $547.88 for labor which plaintiff performed for defendants at their request, for moneys expended by plaintiff at their request in the purchase of Lima and other beans and of agricultural products of California between the 1st day of August, 1889, and the 2d day of May, 1890."

Appellants contend that the finding that defendants are indebted to plaintiff for labor performed at their request is a finding outside of the issues. There is no mention of labor in the complaint. But it is alleged that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $697.69 for the balance of an account for beans sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and for commissions on the purchase by plaintiff for defendants of various articles of farm produce; * * * the whole furnished, done, and performed at the request of the defendants. "Commissions" are the compensation to agents, factors, and other persons who manage the affairs of others in recompense for their services, and we think the allegation that defendants are indebted to plaintiff for commissions on the purchase by plaintiff for defendants of various articles of farm produce implies that plaintiff performed services, i. e. labor for defendants in purchasing said articles. The purchase of farm produce necessarily involves more or less labor. We think the findings within the issues. There is no finding upon the issue raised by the counterclaim, and appellants insist that the omission to find upon that issue is a fatal error. We do not know and cannot assume that any evidence was introduced upon that issue. "This court will not reverse for want of a finding upon an issue where there is no evidence in relation to such issue." Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 174, 14 Pac. Rep. 683; Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. Rep. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. Rep. 504. Judgment affirmed.

PERRIN et al. v. McMANN, Sheriff. (No. 14,233.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1892.)

TRESPASS BY SHERIFF—RELEASE OF ATTACHMENT—TENDER OF FEES.

In trespass against a sheriff, it appeared that he held the property under an attachment sued out by plaintiff S. against plaintiff P.; that after the levy a settlement was effected between S. and P., in which P. paid to S. the estimated costs of the attachment; that on the same day B., the attorney of S., filed with the clerk of the court a direction to dismiss the action, and went to the office of defendant, whose term as sheriff had on that day expired, and whose successor had qualified, and gave to M., who had been defendant's bookkeeper, but who advised B. that he no longer represented defendant, notice to release the attachment; and that a few days thereafter B. gave defendant a written notice to release, and tendered him his fees to the date of settlement and dismissal of the action, with which notice defendant refused to comply, unless upon payment of his fees down to the day of release. Held, under St. 1871–72, p. 778, providing that a sheriff may retain the property levied under an attachment until his fees and expenses are paid, that the sheriff was entitled to his fees until notice of the release was served on him.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Trespass by one Perrin and another against one McMann, as sheriff, for retaining the possession of property taken under a levy. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

P. F. Benson and R. N. Taylor, for appellants. R. B. Mitchell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A writ of attachment issued in the action of Sayre v. Perrin was placed in the hands of the defendant, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, for execution; and under it he levied upon certain personal property of the plaintiff herein, January 4, 1889, and placed the same in charge of a keeper. On the 7th of January a settlement of the controversy was effected by the parties to the suit, in which the plaintiff herein paid to Sayre the estimated costs of the action, and Sayre's attorney filed with the clerk a direction to dismiss the action "without costs to either party." A little after 4 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, Sayre's attorney, Benson, went to the sheriff's office for the purpose of directing a release of the property held under the attachment. The 7th of January was the first Monday of that year, and the day on which the term of office of the defendant herein as sheriff expired and that of his successor, Laumeister, began. Laumeister had assumed his duties as sheriff, and taken possession of the office, in the morning of that day; and Simon, to whom Benson handed the direction to release the property, had been the bookkeeper of McMann during his term of office, but at its expiration had been appointed bookkeeper for Laumeister, and was then acting only for him. McMann, as the outgoing sheriff, retained in his custody the property held by him under the attachment, (Sagely v. Livermore, 45 Cal. 613;) and the management of his unfinished business was in the charge of O'Connor, who had been his undersheriff. When Benson handed the directions to Simon, he was told by Simon that McMann's term of office had expired, and that he no longer represented him, but was merely the representative of Laumeister, his successor. Benson, however, insisted that the delivery to Simon was sufficient, and made no effort to find McMann or any one who represented him. On the 9th of January, Benson and Sayre saw O'Connor, and had some conversation about the release of the property, but O'Connor refused to release it except upon the payment of the sheriff's fees, which he then claimed to be $30. Benson, however, refused to pay more than $18, the amount which had accrued at the date of the settlement and dismissal of the action. On the 11th of January, Benson gave to McMann a written notice to release, with which he refused to comply except on payment of the fees; and thereupon this action was brought to recover $5,000 for the alleged trespass of the sheriff in retaining possession of the property for 10 days. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

The defendant was not required to release the property levied on under the writ of attachment until his fees and expenses were paid. The sheriff is the agent of the plaintiff in levying an attachment, and the plaintiff cannot relieve himself from liability for the expenses incurred in such agency by a dismissal of the action, or a mere direction to release the property. Neither can the parties to the action, by an agreement between themselves for its dismissal, deprive the sheriff of his fees, or compel him to look to the solvency or caprice of the plaintiff therefor. Hence, for the purpose of protecting the sheriff against such contingency, it is provided by statute that he may retain the property levied on under an attachment until his fees and expenses are paid. St. 1871–72, p. 778; Robinett v. Connolly, 76 Cal. 56, 18 Pac. Rep. 130. See, also, Hall v. Reflector Co., 66 How. Pr. 31. This statute, providing that he may retain the property until his fees are paid, in effect gives him a lien thereon for their amount, which he may enforce in any suitable mode. Bowe v. Reflector Co., Id. 41. The right of the defendant to compensation for "all damages which he may sustain by reason of the attachment" is protected by the undertaking which the plaintiff in the action is compelled to give to procure the issuance of the writ, (Code Civil Proc. § 539;) and any moneys which he may pay to the sheriff for the release of the property would be a part of such damages, or would form a part of his costs, to be included in any judgment that might be rendered in his favor in the action. If, however, he chooses to effect a settlement with the plaintiff, and accept a dismissal of the action, instead of a judgment in his favor, and thereby waive his right to proceed upon the undertaking, he should see to it that the terms of settlement include the release of the property. If he omit to do so, he cannot correct his omission by throwing his loss upon the sheriff, nor can he compel that officer to look to the plaintiff for the expenses incurred in the attachment.

In the present case, the plaintiff herein paid to Sayre the money with which to defray the sheriff's expenses incurred in keeping the property attached, but, when Benson went to the sheriff's office to direct the release, he made no offer to make such payment, although he knew that the expenses had been incurred at his request; and there was no offer on the part of Sayre to make any payment until the 9th of January. At that date the expenses had amounted to $30, but he refused to pay more than $18, which was the amount that had accrued on the 7th, when the settlement was effected. When Benson went to the sheriff's office to procure the release of the property, he was not only charged with public notice, by virtue of the statute defining the sheriff's term of office, that McMann was no longer sheriff, but he was expressly notified by Simon that he no longer represented McMann, and that the office was in the occupancy of Laumeister. He knew that Laumeister could not release property held by McMann under the attachment, and that any notice given to Laumeister would be unavailing to affect McMann's right to retain the property. It was his duty then, if he wished to procure its release, to seek out McMann, or his representative, and procure the release from him. It was his failure to do so, and not any delinquency on the part of McMann, that caused the additional expenses to accrue, and consequently those additional expenses should have been paid by him before he could demand a release of the property.

HEINLEN v. HEILBRON et al. (No. 14,489.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1892.)

QUIETING TITLE — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — REVIEW ON APPEAL—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

1. Where, in an action to quiet title, the finding of the trial court as to the ownership of the lands in controversy depends on the determination of a question of fact in which there is testimony on both sides, an appellate court will make no inquiry as to the preponderance of the evidence.

2. The admission, on plaintiff's request, of diagrams, each purporting to be a "certified copy of a copy" of a swamp-land survey, was harmless error, when plaintiff afterwards introduced patents from the state for the land embraced in the survey.

3. On motion for a new trial, defendants presented affidavits to the effect that after the submission of the cause, and prior to the decision, the judge purchased lands which formed a part of the same original tract as patented, to which, according to defendants, the lands in suit belonged. No facts were presented, however, to show that the judge's title to the lands which he purchased in any way depended on the evidence or law involved in determining the rights of the parties to this action. Held, that the judge was not disqualified.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by one Heinlen against one Heilbron and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. N. Welch, (Daggett & Adams, of counsel,) for appellants. G. A. Heinlen, (R. E. Houghton, of counsel,) for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff claims title to the lands in question by virtue of certain patents issued to him by the state of California, and the defendants claim that the lands are included within the boundaries of the Rancho Laguna de Tache, of which they are the owners. The lands in question were listed and patented to the state of California by the United States as a portion of the swamp and overflowed lands granted by the act of congress of September 28, 1850, while the patent for the Rancho Laguna de Tache was issued upon a grant made by the Mexican government in January, 1846, to Manuel Castro, and subsequently confirmed to him by the United States court; and the question controverted before the court below was whether the lands in question were a portion of those embraced in the patent for the rancho. The lands included in this patent are described as bounded on the south and east by the meanders of Kings river, so that the real question to be determined was the location of Kings river. The court found that the plaintiff was the owner of the lands in controversy, and that the defendants have no interest therein, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

1. In their motion for a new trial the defendants assigned as one of the grounds the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision of the court, and specified as the particulars thereof that the evidence showed that the lands were a portion of the Rancho Laguna de Tache. The finding of the court of the ultimate fact that the plaintiff was the owner of the lands in question includes, as one of the probative facts upon which it depends, the fact that the lands in question are situated to the south and east of Kings river, and this probative fact is the point of attack made by the appellants upon the findings of the court. But upon this controverted point there was testimony upon both sides before the court, and it is a sufficient answer to the appeal that the court has heard the evidence, and rendered its decision thereon. Upon an appeal from that decision, no inquiry can be made respecting the preponderance of evidence. If there be any evidence in support of the finding, the action of the court must be affirmed. It is only when there is no evidence in the record in support of a finding that a decision of the trial court will be reversed upon the ground that it is unsupported by the evidence. The location of Kings river, with reference to any particular tract of land, was a question of fact, to be determined upon the testimony of witnesses. Whether any particular section or tract of land is upon one or the other side of the river was also a question of fact, and the determination of these facts depended upon the knowledge which the witnesses had of the river and the land. If the land were a well-defined inclosure, it would be open to the observation of any one, while, if its location depended upon an actual survey, it would be more difficult of ascertainment. It cannot be assumed, however, that the location of a township section can be shown only by one who has made an actual survey of its lines. It may be that its position is established by boundaries as definite and well known as those between two coterminous states or nations. Upon the trial herein there was much positive testimony that the lands in question were situated upon the south and east of Kings river, and, unless there was evidence to the contrary sufficient to overcome the effect of this testimony, the trial court was justified in so finding. The competency of the witnesses to so testify, as well as their knowledge of the subject, were open to the cross-examination of the opposite party, and it was for the court to determine, after such examination, how much weight was to be given to their testimony. Similar testimony was also given by Norboe, a surveyor, called on behalf of the plaintiff, who also testified that he had made an actual survey of the lands in question, and that they were situated to the south and east of Kings river. The extent and accuracy of such survey were also to be passed upon by the court, and his testimony is not to be entirely rejected because he did not "run around the whole section with a compass and chain." If he had ascertained that the north and west lines of the section were to the south and east of the meanders of Kings river, the location of the other lines of the section was not essential in order to determine whether the section was included within the rancho.

It was claimed by the defendants that what is sometimes called "Button Willow" slough is in reality Kings river, and is the line of boundary designated as Kings river upon the map attached to the patent. On the other hand, it was claimed that Kings river, as delineated upon that map, is located to the north and west of Button Willow slough. In support of their contention the defendants called a surveyor, Choice, who did not profess to have made any survey of the lands in question, but testified merely that he had compared the plat of a survey made by him with the map attached to the patent of the rancho, and that the lines agreed very closely, "except at the lower end, where there was some difference." He also testified that at this end there was a difference of a half mile in the location of Button Willow slough; that the map on the patent located it a half mile further west than he did. This, in reality, corroborated Norboe's evidence, and when Choice was interrogated thereto he testified that he was unable to say that the survey incorporated in the patent followed Button Willow slough. The trial court had before it the witnesses, as well as various maps and diagrams offered in evidence. The statement used upon the motion for a new trial speaks in many places of references made by witnesses to these maps and diagrams, by pointing to places and lines thereon which are not reproduced in the record before us, but which we must assume were pertinent to the decision, and may have given weight to the plaintiff's contention. There was at least such a conflict in the evidence that we would not be justified in attempting to review its sufficiency.

2. Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff offered in evidence two diagrams, each of which purported to be a "certified copy of a copy" of a swamp-land survey, to which the defendants objected, upon the ground that the same was irrelevant and immaterial and incompetent, in that it was not a certified copy of an original document, but merely a certified copy of a copy. This objection was overruled, and the action of the court is now assigned as error. It is unnecessary for us to determine whether these documents were admissible in evidence in the form in which they were presented, inasmuch as at a later stage of the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the patents from the state for the land embraced in the surveys. The evident object of introducing the copies of the surveys was to show the several steps by which the plaintiff had become entitled to the patent for the lands therein described; but, as the patents were themselves the highest evidence of the transfer from the state of its title to the lands, and also evidence that all the steps prescribed for their issuance, including the survey, had been properly taken, they superseded all proof of these previous steps, and rendered any evidence thereof immaterial and unnecessary. Even if it should be regarded that the evidence was incompetent, it would not diminish the effect of the patent, and, inasmuch as the patent itself was the highest evidence of the transfer of the state's title, these documents could not add to its effect. The error, therefore, if any there was, was innocuous.

3. Upon the motion for a new trial the defendants presented certain affidavits for the purpose of showing that the judge who had tried the cause was disqualified to sit or act in the case, and that his decision therein was therefore without any authority, and should have been set aside. These affidavits are to the effect that after the submission of the case, and prior to his decision, he purchased certain lands in the vicinity of Kings river which the defendants claim to be a portion of Rancho Laguna de Tache. They do not, however, present any facts from which it can be seen that his title to those lands in any respect depends upon the evidence or law involved in determining the rights of the parties to this action, or which were litigated herein; and we cannot assume that the facts or law involved in any controversy that may arise respecting his title thereto are the same as those here involved. Those lands are several miles distant from the lands involved in this action, and, for aught that is shown by the affidavits, the title thereto may depend upon facts entirely distinct from those here presented. The main question in this case, as we have seen, was the location of Kings river in the vicinity of the lands claimed by the plaintiff; it being contended, on the one hand, that Button Willow slough is a branch of that river, and the line designated on the patent for the rancho as one of its boundaries, and, on the other hand, that it is a distinct and independent waterway. Button Willow slough, however, terminates many miles to the south of the lands claimed to have been purchased by the judge, and the determination of its location cannot be involved in any controversy that may arise between him and the defendants. While it is essential that a judge before whom a cause is tried shall be wholly disinterested in the result, in order that his decision may be entirely impartial, it must at the same time be considered that any person who holds the responsible position of a judge will always be sensitive to any suggestion of his interest in a matter before him, and quick to free himself from any opportunity of acting in a case in which he is disqualified. It must also be considered that the same desire to be faithful to his office which will cause him to decline to sit or act in such a case will be his reason for acting in any case in which he is not disqualified. He has no more right to refuse to act in a matter before him where he is not disqualified than he has to act in a cause in which he is disqualified, either from interest, or from any other reason. The fact that a judge has acted in the trial and decision of any cause must be held conclusive that in his own opinion he was competent to act; and, in such a case, he who would attack his right to act therein must show his disqualification by facts of a positive and unequivocal character. The presumption which attaches to the integrity of any act which he may perform under the sanction of his official oath cannot be overcome by inference or conjecture. As the facts presented in the affidavits herein do not sustain the charge against the judge of interest in the question litigated before him, they cannot be considered as a ground for setting aside his decision.

Ex parte BROWN. (No. 20,976.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1892.)

Violating Election Laws—Evidence—Production of Ballots.

Pol. Code, § 1265, provides that, on receipt of the package of ballots cast at an election, the clerk must file it, and keep it unopened for a year, after which he shall burn it, without examining the contents, if there is no contest about such election. Section 1266 provides that, if a contest is commenced within a year, he must keep the package unopened, unless ordered to produce it by the court in which the contest is pending, so that evidence may be had of its contents. Held, that a court has no power to compel the production of a package of ballots cast at an election, for the purpose of obtaining evidence in a preliminary investigation of a criminal charge against an election officer for violating election laws.

In bank.

W. A. Brown, a register of voters, was, by order of court, commanded to produce a package of ballots, that evidence of their contents might be used in the investigation of a charge of felony alleged to have been committed by an election inspector; and, on his refusal to produce the package he was committed to jail for contempt, and sued out a writ of habeas corpus. Discharged.

Matt I. Sullivan and Chas. Heggerty, for petitioner. Mr. Beatty and Crittenden Thornton, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner is registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco. His duties as such are in all material respects the same as those imposed by law upon county clerks in the other counties of the state. Act March 18, 1878, (St. p. 299, § 4;) Pol. Code, (New,) § 1216, added by Act March 20, 1891, (St. p. 165, § 32.) It appears from his petition, and the return to the writ issued herein, that the Honorable C. W. SLACK, one of the judges of the superior court of San Francisco, acting in the capacity of a committing magistrate, caused the arrest of one Napthaly upon a charge of felony alleged to have been committed by him as inspector of one of the election precincts of said city and county, at the recent general election. While conducting the examination of said charge, in his capacity of committing magistrate, said judge made, and caused to be duly served upon the petitioner, an order requiring him to produce and open the sealed package of ballots returned from the precinct at which said Napthaly acted as such inspector. The petitioner refused to produce the package of ballots, for the purpose of opening them, and for such refusal was adjudged guilty of contempt, and committed to the county jail, whereupon he sued out this writ for the purpose of testing the legality of his imprisonment.

It is the settled law of this state that no court or judge has power to punish as a contempt the violation or disregard of an unlawful order. To attempt to do so, by means of imprisonment, is an excess of jurisdiction remediable by the writ of habeas corpus. The question for decision, therefore, and the only question discussed by counsel, is the legality of the order made by the committing magistrate, requiring petitioner to produce in court, and open, the sealed package of ballots. I say "committing magistrate," because a judge of the superior court, acting in that capacity, has no authority over the registrar of voters or the county clerk which is not fully shared by every police judge and justice of the peace in the state. If he can order a sealed package of ballots to be opened for the purpose of obtaining evidence supposed to be material in the preliminary investigation of a criminal charge, so may any one of them. There is, indeed, no middle course between holding that the ballots must be kept as the law in terms directs them to be kept, i. e., sealed and in the exclusive possession of the registrar or county clerk, or that any judicial officer of any grade may, in any judicial proceeding, civil or criminal, take them out of the possession and control of the officer charged with their custody, open them, and keep them during such time, and subject to such precautions, as he may deem necessary for the purposes of his investigation and the preservation of their integrity. The statutory provisions in regard to the preservation and custody of the ballots are contained in sections 1259 to 1266 of the Political Code. It is thereby made the duty of the precinct election officers to securely seal up the ballots as soon as they have been counted and to deliver them to the county clerk, (or registrar, in San Francisco,) by the hands of one of their own members, or by the nearest postmaster, or a sworn express agent. The duty of the clerk or registrar is prescribed by sections 1265 and 1266 of the Political Code, which read as follows: "Sec. 1265. Upon the receipt of the package, the clerk must file the one containing ballots, and must keep it unopened and unaltered for twelve months. After which time, if there is not a contest commenced in some tribunal having jurisdiction about such election, he must burn the package, without opening or examining its contents. Sec. 1266. If, within twelve months, there is such a contest commenced, he must keep the package unopened and unaltered until it is finally determined, when he must, as provided in the preceding section, destroy it, unless such package is, by virtue of an order of the tribunal in which the contest is pending, brought and opened before it, to the end that evidence may be had of its contents, in which event the package and contents are in the custody of such tribunal." It is manifest that the duty thus imposed upon the clerk or registrar is not performed, according to the terms of the statute, if he parts with the custody of the ballots, or opens the packages, or permits them to be opened, or fails to destroy them at the expiration of a year without examination, except in the single case of a contest before a competent tribunal, when, and when only, he may, upon a proper order of such tribunal, deliver the ballots into its custody, to be opened and used as evidence.

It is not pretended that the proceeding pending before Judge SLACK is a "contest," within the meaning of the statute. On the contrary, it is admitted that a contest means a proceeding by a candidate apparently defeated, according to the face of the returns, in which he seeks to impeach the returns by evidence of a higher character, as, for example, by a recount of the ballots. Nevertheless, it is contended that the magistrate had the power in this proceeding to compel the registrar, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, to do that which the law has forbidden him to do under the same penalties. If this is so, it must be because the law is unconstitutional, or that it does not mean what its terms import, or that the power of the courts is, in this matter, superior to that of the legislature. As to the first proposition, I need only say that the constitutionality of the law has not been assailed. As to the last, it is not denied that with respect to rules of evidence, generally, the courts are strictly bound by the laws enacted by the legislature. The only question, therefore, is as to the proper construction of the statute, considered in relation to other statutes and rules of law in pari materia. As to this point the contention of counsel is, in substance, that the literal terms of the statute must give way to the general legal principle that all courts have the power to compel the production of the best evidence within the reach of their process, and material to the issue to be tried, and that the parties to the litigation have a right to the production of such evidence for the enforcement or the defense of their rights. The correctness and the importance of this principle are conceded, but at the same time it cannot be denied that it is within the power of the legislature to set it aside in pursuance of a policy which it deems of paramount importance. A familiar instance of such a law and such a policy is the privilege accorded to communications made to a priest, a physician, or an attorney, by penitent, patient, or client. Such communications would in many instances conclusively establish the truth of criminal charges or the invalidity of property claims; and yet the law prohibits their disclosure, because, by protecting such confidential communications, a greater mischief is prevented than results from the loss of a particular kind of evidence. And so with regard to these ballots. If the legislature, in pursuance of a paramount object, has determined that they shall not be inspected after they have left the hands of the precinct officers, except for one specific purpose, the courts can no more lay hands upon them, as a means of proof, than they can compel a lawyer, doctor, or priest to disclose communications made to him in his professional character, and under the seal of professional confidence.

What, then, is and has been the policy of the legislature with respect to election ballots? Ever since the system of voting by ballot came into use it has, of course, been possible for election officers to commit frauds in counting, the best evidence of which would be furnished by an inspection of the ballots themselves. But, in spite of this fact, the election laws of many of the states provided that the ballots should be destroyed as soon as counted. Such was the law of this state from 1850 to 1863. St. 1850, p. 104, § 35; St. 1863, p. 354, § 5. Now, whatever may have been the object of this provision,—whether the preservation of the secrecy of the ballot, or something else,—it was plainly inconsistent with any use of the ballots for the purpose of proving fraud; and when it was amended by the act of 1863 so as to require the ballots to be returned under seal to the county clerk, to be kept by him for at least six months, it was provided by the same amendment that any person denying the correctness of the returns could demand a recount of the ballots,—a clear indication that the object of the amendment was to furnish a new ground of contest to candidates apparently defeated. There is nothing, however, in the terms of this first amendment, inconsistent with the use of the ballots as evidence for other purposes than a contest; and, if the law had remained as then enacted, I should have entertained no doubt that they could be used as evidence to sustain a criminal accusation. But the law was not allowed to remain as then enacted. On the contrary, it was substantially changed by the adoption of the Political Code, and the note of the code commissioners to section 1266 shows the motive of the change, viz. to preserve the evidence of the actual vote, and protect it by all the safeguards that can be conveniently thrown around it, until it can be examined in a tribunal authorized to try contested election cases. This, then, was the object of the law, evident not only from the language and all the provisions of the statute, but expressly set forth by the commissioners who framed it. It was to preserve the best evidence of the actual vote for the trial of contested elections, and to protect it by all the safeguards that could be conveniently thrown around it. This being done, the same amendment provided, ex industria, that the ballots, being no longer needed for a contest, should be destroyed without examination. It is therefore not only inconsistent with the terms of the law, but destructive of its policy to hold that the ballots, for the security and integrity of which such careful provision is made, are subject to be removed from the custody of the registrar, opened, handled, and exposed to the danger of all sorts of changes and mutilations, as often as any judicial officer may conclude that they contain evidence material to an issue depending before him; for, when once the terms of the statute are set aside, not only judges of the highest character and position can order the sealed ballots to be produced and opened, but every judicial officer in the state may do the like, and it will depend wholly upon his individual judgment and discretion what precautions shall be taken to prevent them from being tampered with. The object of the law being to afford the means of impeaching the returns of the election officers, not only all candidates, but the entire public, are interested in preserving the integrity of the sealed packages of ballots; for they cannot be produced in evidence without satisfactory preliminary proof that they remain in the same condition in which they were taken from the ballot box. McCreary, Elect. (2d Ed.) § 277, and cases cited; Coglan v. Beard, 67 Cal. 303, 7 Pac. Rep. 738. When they have been kept by the clerk or registrar, such proof is an extremely simple matter. When they have been beyond his control, it becomes extremely difficult, and in many cases impossible.

We are asked by counsel how the declared intention of the legislature to punish frauds by election officers can be reconciled with an intention to prevent the use of the best means of proving such frauds. It might as well be asked how the plain injunction of the statute that the ballots must be destroyed at the end of one year can be reconciled with the law which authorizes a prosecution to be commenced at any time within three years. Both these questions may be answered in the same way. The different provisions are in neither case absolutely inconsistent; and, if it is true that the preservation of the ballots as the law directs is an obstacle to the enforcement of the newly-provided penalties for frauds of election officers, this result flows from the fact that the legislature in this instance, as in so many others, has failed in revising the old law, to co-ordinate its different parts so as to bring them into perfect harmony with its new policy. This failure of provision, however, if, indeed, there was such failure, cannot be remedied by the courts, but must be left to the legislature itself for amendment. If it is thought necessary to make the ballots available as evidence in criminal proceedings, the legislature can do so, under such limitations and restrictions as may be deemed essential to their integrity. The courts cannot open them for inspection without destroying all safeguards, except as each particular judge who may order them into court shall see proper to apply, nor without impairing in all cases, and possibly destroying in many, their value as evidence for the only purpose for which the law has directed their preservation. The prisoner is discharged.

TOWER v. McDOWELL, Sheriff. (No. 19,004.)

TROVER—EVIDENCE—LEVY AFTER EXPIRATION OF EXECUTION.

1. Where, in trover against a sheriff, who claimed to hold by virtue of a levy under an execution, plaintiff introduced in evidence the execution under which defendant justified the taking, and his return thereon, showing the levy and sale and amount received from such sale, the exclusion of oral testimony as to what the property sold for is not harmful to the defendant.

2. Where it appeared by the sheriff's return on an execution that a levy under it was not made until after the expiration of the life of the execution, such levy by a sheriff is without jurisdiction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Trover by Virginia A. Tower against S. A. McDowell, sheriff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sprigg & Barber, for appellant. Shaw & Holland, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action in the nature of trover to recover the value of certain personal property of plaintiff's alleged to have been wrongfully taken and converted to his own use by the defendant. The defendant denied that the plaintiff owned or possessed the property at the time it was taken, and alleged that it was then owned and possessed by F. C. Tower, plaintiff's husband, and F. E. Bates, from whom defendant, as sheriff, took it by authority of a writ of execution against them in favor of the First National Bank of San Diego. It was further alleged in the answer of defendant that F. C. Tower and F. E. Bates made a bill of sale of the property to plaintiff without consideration, and for the purpose of defrauding their creditors, and that the sale was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of the property, nor followed by an actual or continued change of possession thereof. The cause was tried without a jury, and the court found the facts on all the material issues in favor of the plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly for the sum of $3,349.39. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence, though conflicting, on the issues as to value, immediate delivery, and continued change of possession of the property, is sufficient to justify all the findings of fact, and the findings support the judgment; nor do appellant's counsel seem to contend with much confidence to the contrary, but in their reply brief say: "The principal error complained of by appellant on the trial, on the motion for new trial, and on this appeal, is the refusal of the trial court to permit evidence of the sums for which the property sold at a well attended, fairly conducted auction sale, at which the bidding was spirited, and the competition sharp." This refers to the sheriff's sale of the property in question, consisting of the stock of a livery stable,—horses, buggies, wagons, and appliances, about fifty in number. Indeed, the only possible ground for reversal available to appellant is that the court erred in excluding or admitting evidence touching the issue as to the value of the property, since the defendant did not offer in evidence the execution under which he justified the taking, nor any execution whatever, nor the return upon any execution. The plaintiff, however, in rebuttal, put in evidence the execution under which defendant justified (issued March 5, 1889,) and the sheriff's return thereon, showing that he received the execution on March 5, 1889, levied it on July 13, 1889, and sold the property on July 29, 1889, in separate parcels, for the aggregate sum of $2,355.42. It thus appears that the best evidence of what the property sold for was introduced by the plaintiff, so that the rejection of oral evidence offered by defendant, even if competent, could not have injured him. Besides, it does not appear that the court excluded oral evidence of the aggregate sum for which all the property sold. Defendant asked one of his witnesses the following question: "Do you know whether or not the sheriff's sale of the property described in the complaint was advertised by printed handbills scattered through the cities of San Diego and Coronado?"

This question being objected to, the defendant's attorney made the following offer: "We offer to prove by the witness and by others that the sale by the sheriff was thoroughly advertised in San Diego and Coronado Beach; that a large number of bidders were present at the sale, and there was great competition in the purchase of the property, and that the property described in the complaint brought on the sale less than $2,000." Upon objection to this offer the court said: "I shall sustain the objection to the question. There is a part of the offer that is competent. The objection to the offer will be overruled." Yet the defendant did not then or afterwards offer evidence of any part of what he had offered to prove, except that he afterwards asked another witness what a single hack sold for, which was immaterial, without an offer to prove what all the property sold for.

By the introduction of the execution in evidence it further appeared that the alleged levy was not made until long after the expiration of the life of the execution, it having been issued on March 5th, and not levied until July 13th. Upon the execution are the following indorsements: "S. A. McDowell, Esq., Sheriff of S. D. County—Sir: The within execution and judgment is properly assigned to C. L. Barber by the bank. We have further authority to represent said judgment. July 12, 1889. Yours, etc., Sprigg & Barber, Att's." "The within execution is hereby renewed, and the time of its return extended sixty days. July 13, 1889. Sprigg & Barber, Plaintiff's Att'ys." These indorsements did not revive or renew the execution, and counsel for appellant do not so contend. At the time the defendant attempted to execute it by taking the property in question it was functus officio, and afforded no jurisdiction for the taking, and the defendant is liable for the taking to the same extent he would have been without any writ in his possession. Freem. Ex'ns, § 106, and case there cited. If the views above expressed are correct, all other questions mooted are immaterial. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Haynes, C.

HEFT v. PAYNE. (No. 14,356.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1892.)

Street Assessments — Foreclosure of Lien — Defenses — Time for Completing Work—Extension—Estoppel of Property Owner.

1. In an action to foreclose a lien for a street assessment, the complaint showed that the work was not completed within the time named in the contract, but alleged as an excuse that the city failed to furnish a steam roller, as provided in the specifications, until too late to do the work within the specified time. Held, that a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained; the lot owner not being a party to the contract, and the city's failure to furnish the roller not being binding on him.

2. In an action to foreclose a lien for a street assessment, the complaint averred that the street commissioner accepted the work and issued his warrant; that the lot owners, including defendants, appealed to the city council and filed objections; that at the hearing thereof they waived all objections which they might have by reason of a failure to complete the work within the contract time; and that the council, relying on such representations, set aside the assessment and warrant, and ordered further work to be done, which, when completed, was accepted by the council. Held that, it not being an action to enforce a personal liability, defendant was not estopped from setting up that the work was not done within the contract time.

3. The action of the city council in setting aside the first assessment and warrant, and in directing further work, did not operate as an extension of time; the act under which the work was done providing that if the owners or contractor fail to complete the work within the time limited, "or within such further time as the city council may give them, the superintendent of streets shall report such delinquency to the city council, which may relet the unfinished portion of said work."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by one Heft against one Payne. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Burt, for appellant. A. S. Kittredge, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. Judgment in favor of defendant was entered in the court below on demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff has appealed.

The work was not completed within the time named in the contract, nor within the time of any extension given, but, to avoid the effect of the failure of the contractor to complete the work within such time, it is alleged that in the specifications for the work it was provided that the city (San Jose) should furnish a steam roller for rolling the rock used in macadamizing the street, and that the city, though often called upon to furnish the roller, has neglected to do so, until it was too late for the contractors to perform the work within the time. It is alleged that the contractors applied to the city council for an extension of time, but the council failed to act on the application, and that their failure to complete the work within the time allowed was due to the failure of the city to furnish the roller, as provided in the contract. We think that the excuse offered for the failure to perform within the time agreed upon is insufficient. The lot owner, in such cases, is in no sense a party to the contract, except as one of the public upon whose property the burden of payment for the improvement is placed. The city does not act as his agent to bind him personally, but in its sovereign capacity, as in matters of taxation; and the failure of the city to furnish the steam roller is no more binding upon him than would be the failure of any other person who may have agreed to furnish the contractor with machinery, teams, or material to be used in the work required by the contract. His liability arises out of no agreement, express or implied, between him, in his individual character, and the street contractor. He has nothing to say in determining whether the work shall or shall not be done by the contractor, nor—in the absence of fraud—whether the work has been done according to the contract; but he can "question the regularity of the proceeding resulting in the assessment, in the same manner and upon the same principles as the validity of a tax may be questioned." Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 84; Meuser v. Risdon, 36 Cal. 245. Dyer v. Barstow, 50 Cal. 654.

In the second count it is alleged that the street commissioner accepted the work and issued his warrant; that the defendant and other lot owners appealed to the city council, and filed objections; that the latter appeared and took part in the hearing of the objections, and expressly waived all objections which they might have by reason of the failure of the contractors to complete the work within the time fixed or any extension thereof, and stated that all they wanted was a completion of the improvement to the satisfaction of the council, and when that was accomplished no further objections would be made, and the assessment for the work would be paid; that the council, relying on the good faith of said representations, set aside the assessment and warrant, and ordered further work to be done; that plaintiff, relying on the good faith of said promises, went on and completed the work to the satisfaction of the proper officers and of said council, and the work was, by resolution, accepted, a new assessment made, and a warrant issued and recorded, demand for payment made, etc. It is contended that the defendant is estopped, by his representations and promise, from claiming that the work was not done within the time required. But this is an action purely to foreclose a lien on the land for the cost of a public improvement. There is no personal liability, and to such proceedings the doctrine of estoppel in pais has no application. Meuser v. Risdon, supra. If there is no lien, there can be no recovery. The lot alone is liable; and, if there was no lien at the time it is claimed a waiver was made, we do not see how any could have been created by the oral statements of the defendant. Whether the alleged conduct of the defendant created any personal liability on his part to pay a portion of the work done on the public highway is a question which we are not called upon to decide.

It is claimed that the act of the city council in setting aside the first assessment and warrant, and in directing further work, operated as an extension of time. We do not think this contention is warranted by the provisions of the act under which the work was done. It provides that "if the owners or contractor who may have taken any contracts do not complete the same within the time limited in the contract, or within such further time as the city council may give them, the superintendent of streets shall report such delinquency to the city council, which may relet the unfinished portion of said work after pursuing the formalities prescribed hereinbefore for the letting of the whole." This is substantially the same provision found in other statutes, and which has been given a construction in several cases adverse to appellant's contention. Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 56; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 429, 9 Pac. Rep. 427; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 455, 10 Pac. Rep. 672; Raisch v. City and County of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. Rep. 22. The decision in Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 246, upon which appellant relies, was based upon an amendment to section 7 of the act of 1862, passed April 25, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 526.) Turney v. Dougherty, 53 Cal. 620; Beveridge v. Livingstone, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUCK v. CITY OF EUREKA. (No. 14,561.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1893.)

CHANGE OF VENUE — DEMAND BY ATTORNEYS — RESIDENTS OF COUNTY—TOWNS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 396, provides that, where an action is commenced in the wrong county, defendant must, in order to obtain a change of venue, make a written demand therefor. Held, that a demand signed by defendant's attorneys, saying that "we demand," instead of that defendant demands, is sufficient, though not a literal compliance with the statute.

2. A town is a resident of the county in which it is located, within Code Civil Proc. § 395, providing that certain actions shall be brought in the county in which defendant resides.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by S. M. Buck against the city of Eureka to recover for legal services performed for defendant. From an order granting a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. J. Heggerty and S. M. Buck, (W. C. Belcher, of counsel,) for appellant. J. N. Gillett and Haven & Haven, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant is a municipal corporation, composed of the inhabitants of a city in Humboldt county. The action, which is for the value of legal services performed at San Francisco, was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. On motion of defendant, the court made an order changing the place of trial of the action to Humboldt county. The plaintiff appeals from this order.

The first point made in support of the appeal is that the defendant made no written demand for a change of the place of trial, such as is required by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There was a written demand filed at the proper time in the following form: "To the Honorable Judge of said Court, and to Chas. J. Heggerty, Esq., Attorney for Said Plaintiff. We hereby demand that the place of trial of this cause be changed to the proper county, viz. the county of Humboldt, California. Dated this 1st day of September, 1890. J. N. GILLETT, Eureka, California. HAVEN & HAVEN, San Francisco, California." It is contended that this was a demand, not by the defendant, but by its attorneys; and in favor of such construction it is insisted that the provisions of the statute relating to change of the place of trial must receive a strict construction. We know of no reason why they should be subjected to a strict construction. The rule, on the contrary, is that remedial statutes should be liberally construed in favor of the remedy, and rules of procedure are remedial in their nature. The law advises the plaintiff as to the proper county in which to commence his action, and he ought to follow the rule prescribed. He is indulged so far, however, that when the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial, the action may nevertheless be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county. Code Civil Proc. § 396. With respect to the demand here required, nothing appears to have been deemed essential except that it be made in writing, like motions generally, and that it be made promptly before the court in which the action was commenced has been called upon to deal with its merits. Subject to these reasonable conditions, the fullest recognition should be accorded to the right of the defendant to have the case transferred to the proper county. The cases in which it has been held that, in addition to written notice of his intention to move for a change of the place of trial, the defendant must also serve and file another paper in the literal form of a demand for a change, (a proceeding entirely superfluous,) seem to have gone as far in the way of strictness as there is any call for. Here we have, in addition to a notice of the motion, a demand in writing, the only objection to which is that the attorneys of the defendant, describing themselves as such, say that they demand instead of saying that the defendant demands. It may be that they do not formally comply with the literal terms of the statute, but they have satisfied its reason by a substantial compliance, and that is sufficient.

Coming to the merits of the order, we will notice, in the first place, the contention of appellant that the right to commence the action and have it tried in San Francisco is given by section 16 of article 12 of the constitution. To this view we cannot assent. The twelfth article of the constitution relates exclusively to private corporations, and consequently the provisions of section 16 have no application to a suit against a public municipal corporation. The statute alone must be looked to for a definition of the right of defendant as to the place of trial of this action, and, as there is no specific provision on the subject of actions against municipal corporations, other than counties, the question is narrowed down to this: whether the defendant is a resident of Humboldt county, within the meaning of the general provision (Code Civil Proc. § 395) requiring actions like this to be tried in the county in which the defendant resides. It is argued that a municipal corporation cannot be said to reside anywhere, because it is an entity, incapable of having a residence. This is undoubtedly true in the ordinary and restricted sense of the word "residence." But in this respect a municipal corporation occupies a position at least as favorable as an ordinary trading corporation, and it is settled law in this state that a domestic trading corporation, within the meaning of this statute, resides in the county where it has its principal place of business. This was first decided in 1863, in the case of Jenkins v. Stage Co., 22 Cal. 537, and remained unquestioned at the time our present Code of Procedure was adopted. It must, therefore, be assumed that the legislature, in adopting section 395, intended it to apply to corporations. One of the departments of this court, it is true, did criticise the doctrine of Jenkins v. Stage Co., in two cases decided here in 1884, and seems to have intended to overrule it. California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 65 Cal. 394, 409, 4 Pac. Rep. 344, 388. In another case, reported in the same volume, p. 601, (Thomas v. Mining Co., 4 Pac. Rep. 641,) the other department also seemed to doubt the correctness of the decision in Jenkins v. Stage Co. But in a later case, decided by the court in bank, the doctrine of Jenkins v. Stage Co. was distinctly reaffirmed, as we think it ought to have been, and the question must be considered closed. Cohn v. Railroad Co., 71 Cal. 488, 12 Pac. Rep. 498. By an obvious mistake, in a reference, the case in 65 Cal. 394, is cited as authority in Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 497, 24 Pac. Rep. 157, where it is evident the case of Jenkins v. Stage Co. was meant, for the doctrine of the earlier case is distinctly reaffirmed. It is then, as we have said, settled law of this state that a domestic trading corporation resides, within the meaning of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the county where its principal place of business is; and if so, a municipal corporation a fortiori resides where its territory is, and where all its constituents reside. The defendant, therefore, had a right to demand a transfer of this cause to Humboldt county. Order affirmed.

KENNEDY v. CALIFORNIA SAV. BANK et al. (No. 19,052.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1892.)

ATTACHMENT—ACTION FOR MONEY—JOINT DEFENDANTS.

1. The personal liability of a stockholder for his proportion of the corporate debts, under Const. art. 12, § 3, is an obligation arising on a contract, within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 537, providing for an attachment in an action on a contract for the direct payment of money.

2. Where an attachment is issued against a corporation and its stockholders jointly, and the complaint demands different amounts from the several defendants, the writ must conform to the complaint, and direct the attachment of so much property of the respective defendants as will secure the amount alleged to be due from each.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by Kennedy against the California Savings Bank and its stockholders jointly on certificates of deposit. The defendant Havermale makes a motion to dissolve an attachment, and, from an order dissolving the attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellant. Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn and Sprigg & Barber, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving an attachment. The action is upon certificates of deposit issued to plaintiff by the defendant the California Savings Bank, a corporation in which the other defendants are the stockholders, and the relief demanded is for a judgment for the amount of money represented by such certificates, and against each of the defendants for the proportionate part thereof for which he is liable as a stockholder. The motion to dissolve the attachment was made by the defendant Havermale alone, and was upon these grounds: First, that said action is upon a statutory liability, and not upon a contract; second, that the writ of attachment, in its statement of plaintiff's demand against him, is not in conformity with the complaint. These grounds are widely different, the first going to the right of the plaintiff to any attachment in the action, and the last relating only to an irregularity in the writ itself, which could be avoided by the issuance of another; and, unless it was the intention of the court to sustain the motion upon the first ground, it should have specified in the order granting the same that it was based upon the latter ground alone, thus leaving the plaintiff free to take the proper steps in the action to procure the issuance of a writ conforming to the complaint. The order of the court was general, and it is therefore necessary to examine both grounds of the motion in order to fully dispose of all questions affecting the right of the plaintiff to an attachment in the action.

1. The first ground stated in the motion presents the question whether an action against a stockholder for his proportion of the debt of a corporation of which he is a member is upon a "contract," within the meaning of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relative to attachment; and that it is such an action we entertain no doubt. In a general sense, the action is founded upon a contract, and it is none the less so because under the provisions of section 3 of article 12 of the constitution of this state, and section 322 of the Civil Code, the stockholder is made liable to perform the contract in part. The constitution, in the section above referred to, declares: "Sec. 3. Each stockholder of a corporation or joint-stock association shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation or association." This section prescribes the terms upon which individuals are permitted to transact business through the medium of a corporation, and the necessary legal effect of the conditions thus prescribed is that a corporation when created becomes the agent of its stockholders to make such contracts and incur such liabilities as are authorized by law and its articles of incorporation; and the contracts which it thus makes bind the stockholders to the extent named. As said by the supreme court of Ohio, in Brown v. Hitchcock, 36 Ohio St. 678: "The corporation itself is a mere legal entity, existing only in legal contemplation, and is created for the convenience and benefit of the stockholders. All its dealings are for and on their account. It can contract no debts except under the authority, express or implied, of the stockholders, and through their corporate agents. Our constitution and laws, therefore, make it an essential condition to persons thus availing themselves of the instrumentality of a corporation for the transaction of business that the security of their personal liability shall attach to and attend all of the corporate liabilities." It would seem, therefore, that an action against a stockholder to recover his proportion of the amount due upon a contract made by a corporation, which is only an agency adopted by him for the transaction of business, was essentially an action founded upon a contract. Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 496; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47; Hawthorne v. Calef, 2 Wall. 10; Dennis v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 548, 27 Pac. Rep. 1031; Cook, Stock. & S. § 223; Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 327; Ex parte Van Riper, 20 Wend. 616. In the case of Dennis v. Superior Court, above cited, the question whether an action like this was one arising upon contract was directly involved, and we there said: "We think that the personal liability of a stockholder of a corporation for his proportion of the indebtedness of the corporation is an obligation arising upon contract, within the meaning of section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, giving original jurisdiction to a justice's court in actions arising upon contract for the recovery of money when the amount claimed is less than $300." The views here expressed are not in conflict with what was decided in Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545, and the other cases following it which are relied upon and cited by defendant. In those cases the question was whether an action like this against a stockholder was upon a "statutory liability," within the meaning of section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that actions against directors or stockholders of a corporation to recover a penalty or forfeiture imposed, or to enforce a liability created by law, must be brought within the time there specified. The court, in Green v. Beckman, supra, held that it was; that the legislature must have intended the section to apply to such an action; otherwise it was meaningless, in so far as it related to actions against stockholders. The court in that case said: "The construction of section

359 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not free from difficulty. * * * Our attention has not been called to any provision of the statute which imposes any 'penalty' or 'forfeiture' upon a stockholder for any act as such, and no effect can be given to the words 'liability created by law,' unless we apply it to the liability which the law imposes when one becomes a stockholder, and thus establishes the relation to the creditors of the corporation to which the law affixes the responsibility." There is no intimation in this language, nor did the court there intend to hold, that such an action might not also be regarded as based upon "contract," within the general meaning of that phrase, or as used in other chapters of the Code of Civil Procedure; but the court simply held that for the purposes of that section, and in the connection in which they there appear, the words "liability created by law" should be construed as referring to actions, such as this, to enforce the liability of stockholders.

2. The corporation and the other defendants are jointly sued, and the complaint shows the indebtedness of the corporation to plaintiff to be $45,500, of which amount the defendant Havermale is only liable for one fifth. The writ of attachment recited that the action was brought to recover from the defendant $45,500 and costs, and commanded the sheriff "to attach and safely keep all the property of said defendants, * * * or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, as above mentioned." The question presented by the second ground of the motion to discharge the attachment is whether this writ, as thus framed, was irregularly issued as to the defendant Havermale. We think that it was, and the motion to discharge the attachment was properly granted for this reason. Section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the writ of attachment must require the sheriff "to attach and safely keep all the property of such defendant within his county, * * * or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, the amount of which must be stated in conformity with the complaint," etc. In this case, as to defendant Havermale, the writ did not state the amount of plaintiff's demand against him, in conformity with the complaint, but stated a very much larger sum, and by it the sheriff was directed to seize property of his sufficient to satisfy the entire amount due to plaintiff from the corporation, although he was only liable for one fifth of that amount. When the complaint demands different amounts from the several defendants in the action the writ must conform to the complaint, and direct the attachment of so much property of the respective defendants as will secure the amount alleged to be due from each. The clerk is not authorized to issue a writ of attachment against the property of any defendant for an amount exceeding the demand which is made against such defendant in the complaint, and, if he does, the writ must be discharged as to such defendant on his motion. The law upon this point is thus very clearly stated by the supreme court of Utah in Bowers v. Bank, 4 Pac. Rep. 225: "The statute leaves no discretion in any way as to the amount which shall be stated in the writ of attachment. It is a plain, direct, and specific instruction and direction, which the clerk has no right to or authority to disregard. The process of attachment is a special statutory remedy, and in resorting to it the terms of the law conferring it must be strictly pursued. If the clerk had stated any other sum in the writ than that in conformity with the demand in the complaint, it would have been a material departure from the requirements of the statute, and would have vitiated the proceeding, and rendered it utterly void. The requirements of the statute are so plain that there is no room left for construction or speculation." It is urged, however, that as no more of defendant Havermale's property than is sufficient to satisfy the demand against him was attached, he cannot complain, and his motion to discharge the writ should have been denied. But section 556 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the motion to discharge an attachment irregularly issued may be made before any actual levy under the writ; and section 558 of the same Code further declares: "If upon such application it satisfactorily appears that the writ of attachment was improperly or irregularly issued, it must be discharged." Under these sections it is immaterial whether much or little or any property of a defendant has been actually levied upon, but the court must, upon proper application therefor, discharge the writ of attachment thus wrongfully issued, leaving the plaintiff to obtain a new writ, which shall conform to the requirements of the law in its statement of the demand which is made in the complaint. The order in this case will therefore be affirmed, upon the second ground stated in the motion of defendant.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, but I express no opinion on the question whether or not the liability of a stockholder, under the constitution and statute, for his proportionate part of such debts as the corporation may afterwards incur, is the result of "a contract for the direct payment of money" made by the stockholders, within the meaning of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There has been no decision in this state holding that an attachment will lie in such a case; and the opinion of the court in Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545, is rather the other way. In Dennis v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 548, 27 Pac. Rep. 1031, no such question arose or was discussed; and it is not claimed in appellant's brief that in any case cited from other states the direct point here involved was definitely decided. An attachment is a harsh statutory process, by which the property of an alleged debtor is violently taken away from him, prior to an adjudication of the debt, and it should be confined to cases which clearly come within the terms of the statute; and it is not clear to me at the present time that the liability of a stockholder for something that may possibly happen is within the clause of the statute above quoted.

MERCED BANK v. ROSENTHAL et al.[1]

(No. 14,871.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1892.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL — ADVERSE PARTY — APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT—JUDGES — TERMS OF OFFICE—DE FACTO JUDGE—MORTGAGE OF HOMESTEAD.

1. Where a defendant is not served with summons, and makes no appearance, and no judgment is entered against him, and judgment is entered against the other defendants, who are served and appear, the defendant not served is not an "adverse party," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 940, requiring in case of appeal an undertaking to be filed unless the same be waived "by the adverse party, in writing."

2. Where a proceeding is in form a judgment, which, although void, is entered of record, so that it might be made oppressive by the issue of final process thereon, it constitutes a grievance, which may be remedied on appeal to a tribunal for the correction of errors.

3. Const. art. 6, § 6, provides that "the term of office of judges of the superior courts shall be six years from and after the first Monday of January next succeeding their elections." Article 20, § 20, provides that the terms of officers provided for by the constitution "shall commence on the first Monday after the 1st day of January next following their election." Held, that article 20 applies to superior judges, and controls, it being intended to provide generally the exact date of commencement, so that all officers of the state should take office on the same day.

4. Where the judge elect was attorney in a proceeding pending, and his predecessor in office assumed jurisdiction by the entry of judgment on the first Monday of January, which was also the first Monday after the 1st day of January, both judges acting in good faith, and believing that the term of the judge elect did not commence till Tuesday, the judge acting was a de facto judge.

5. Const. art. 17, § 1, requires the legislature to protect by law the homestead from forced sale. Civil Code, § 1241, declares a mortgage foreclosure sale a "forced sale." Section 1242 provides that "the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." Held, where a husband and wife conveyed their homestead by a deed, absolute on its face, and by a contemporaneous oral agreement made the conveyance a mortgage for an existing indebtedness and for future advances to the husband, that the premises retained their homestead character, and the incumbrance for future advances being a mere oral agreement, constituting power in another to incumber at will, and not executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, it was not enforceable. Bull v. Coe, 18 Pac. Rep. 808, 77 Cal. 54, distinguished.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; C. H. MARKS, Judge.

Action by the Merced Bank against A. Rosenthal and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Frank H. Farrar, for appellants. T. C. Law and Breckinridge & Peck, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action is brought to have a deed, absolute on its face, declared a mortgage, and to obtain a foreclosure of the same. It is brought against A. Rosenthal and S. Peckerman, as copartners, doing business under the style of Rosenthal & Peckerman, and against A. Rosenthal and S. Peckerman and Betsy Rosenthal, wife of A. Rosenthal. It is averred that on and prior to July 20, 1883, the copartnership and A. Rosenthal and S. Peckerman were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,900; and "being desirous of establishing a further credit with plaintiff, and of securing the payment of said moneys then due plaintiff, and of securing the payment to plaintiff of any and all other sums of money and advances that might thereafter become due to plaintiff from said defendants, or any of them, and also of securing any and all balances that might thereafter be found due from said defendants, or any of them, to plaintiff in the course of their dealings, whether such indebtedness should be evidenced by promissory notes then or subsequently given or otherwise, the defendants A. Rosenthal and Betsy Rosenthal, on the 20th day of July, 1883, to secure the plaintiff in the principal sum then due, and thereafter to become due, to plaintiff for moneys thereafter to be advanced to said defendants, and the interest thereon, as hereinabove stated, according to the tenor of any promissory notes or other instruments then or thereafter to be given, * * * on said 20th day of July, 1883, executed to plaintiff a deed for the mortgaged premises, absolute on its face, but intended to be and in fact a mortgage, to secure the payment to plaintiff of all money then due at the day of its date, and all moneys to become thereafter due, from said defendants Rosenthal & Peckerman, and A. Rosenthal and S. Peckerman." It is also alleged that Rosenthal and Peckerman were partners, and that certain indebtedness accrued from them to plaintiff subsequent to July 20, 1883, part of which was evidenced by promissory notes, which are set out at length in the complaint. Judgment is asked against defendants Rosenthal & Peckerman for $1,412, with interest at 1¼ per cent. per month from June, 1884, for costs, and for an attorney's fee, a decree of foreclosure and sale of the premises, and for a judgment for the deficiency, if any, against defendants Rosenthal & Peckerman. The defendants A. Rosenthal and Betsy Rosenthal appeared and answered at length, and as between them and plaintiff a trial was had. It does not appear that Peckerman was served with summons, and he did not appear in the case. No default or judgment is entered against him. A decree was entered in favor of plaintiff against A. Rosenthal and Betsy Rosenthal, declaring the deed to be a mortgage, and for a sale of the premises; for the payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the sum of $2,306.95 found due, with direction to the sheriff to report the deficiency, if any, to the court. This appeal is taken by A. Rosenthal and Betsy Rosenthal from the judgment, and from an order refusing them a new trial. The notice of appeal was served upon the plaintiff, but not upon S. Peckerman, and an objection is now made to the jurisdiction of this court to hear the appeal, because the notice was not served on Peckerman. It is contended that the judgment discharges Peckerman from the debts so far as plaintiff is concerned; that upon a reversal he may be brought in and made responsible. He, therefore, it is argued, has an interest in maintaining the judgment, and is an "adverse party," within the meaning of section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Rehearing granted.

But was Peckerman a party to the judgment? It does not appear that he was served with summons, or that he appeared in the case. The issues were made up between the plaintiff and appellants, who went to trial without objection on the ground that Peckerman was not served. The judgment, then, is neither for nor against him. If he had not been named as a party at all, the judgment would have had the same effect upon his interest as now, and upon the reversal of such a judgment he might be brought in and made responsible as now; but, though his interests might be affected by the appeal, he would not, in such case, be an adverse party, nor is he now, as the case stands.

The first point made by appellants is that the judgment is void, because not rendered by a superior judge, but by one Charles H. Marks, who at the time had no official character whatever. It appears that J. K. Law, one of the attorneys for plaintiff, had been elected superior judge of Merced county, at the election in 1890, to succeed Judge Marks, whose term would expire in January following. Judge Law had duly qualified as such judge. This case had been tried some months before, but no findings or judgment had been entered. On Monday, January 5, 1891, that being the first Monday of January following the election of Judge Law, findings were signed by Judge Marks, and an order for judgment made. On the same day judgment was entered "on motion of J. K. Law, Esq., counsel for plaintiff," upon the findings attested as follows: "Done in open court the fifth day of January, 1891. C. H. MARKS, Judge of the Superior Court." Appellants claim that Judge Marks' term of office expired with the 4th day of January, 1891, and Judge Law's term began with the first instant of January 5, 1891. Therefore Marks was not judge when the findings and judgment were made, and the judgment is void. Respondent, in reply to this point, contends: (1) The question is not properly presented, and cannot be raised on this appeal; (2) Judge Marks' term did not expire until 12 o'clock Monday night; and (3) Marks was at least judge de facto.

1. Respondent concedes that an appeal may be taken from a void judgment,—that is, from an apparent judgment which is no judgment,—and that on such appeal the court may determine that the lower court committed such error as will render its proceeding void. This is to review the action of a court, and is in line with its usual functions. The appellant in such a case by appealing does not concede that there is a proper judgment, but only that there is a judgment in form, which he claims is erroneous, even to the extent of rendering it void. But an appeal is necessarily, he contends, from a court to a court, and therefore the appeal concedes that the act which appellants ask to have reversed is the act of a court known to the law, and whose judgments may be reversed here on appeal. One cannot assume the fact of the existence of a court simply to appeal in order to have it declared that such fact does not exist. An objection might be urged to the proposed act of a court that it would be without jurisdiction, but how could one raise the objection that the tribunal was no tribunal? To raise the question would be to ask that the point be sustained; that is, to recognize the tribunal as such. Can an objection be raised on appeal which could not in any mode have been submitted to the lower court? And, then, how in such a proceeding can the respondent show that the acting judge was a judge de facto,—that he was actually holding the place, was reputed to be a judge, and that his acts as such had been acquiesced in? This reasoning on the part of appellants is certainly specious and plausible, but I think only so. It has been held that this court will entertain an appeal from a void judgment under a law giving it jurisdiction of appeals from judgments. A judgment rendered by a court which has no jurisdiction is a judgment made by one who was not legally a judge in that case. Legal phraseology has always designated such a proceeding as coram non judice, and therefore void. Still, as in this case, it would be in form a judgment, entered in the records of a court upon which final process might be issued, which, although void, might through judicial machinery be made oppressive to individuals. It is therefore a grievance which may properly be remedied by a tribunal which exists for the correction of errors. This is not saying that an appeal is the only remedy the aggrieved party may have; and, since the respondent has no opportunity to prove extrinsic facts which might show that Marks was de facto judge, perhaps the inquiry on that point must be limited, and facts presumed to exist, if in the nature of things any could have existed, which would establish the regularity of the proceeding.

2. Since I think it must be held that Marks was at least a de facto judge, it will not be necessary to discuss the second point made by respondent at much length. Some idea of the claim of Judge Marks that his term continued until Tuesday is necessary, however, to show that both he and Judge Law were acting in good faith in claiming that Judge Marks' term had not yet ended. Section 6 of article 6 of the constitution provides: "The term of office of judges of the superior courts shall be six years from and after the first Monday of January next succeeding their election." It is contended that the whole term must be after Monday; that the use of either word "from" or "after" would exclude Monday, and by using both words an intention is manifested to make this clear. The expression cannot be made to mean "from and including," as interpreted in section 69, Code Civil Proc. To sustain this position, numerous authorities are cited; and, if the question depended upon this language alone, I think the position of respondent would be impregnable. But it is not the only provision in the constitution affecting the question. Section 20 of article 20 is: "Elections of the officers provided for by this constitution * * * shall be held on the even-numbered years next before the expiration of their respective terms. The terms of such officers shall commence on the first Monday after the first day of January next following their election." Respondent contends that this provision does not apply to superior judges, because their term is to commence on the first Monday in January, which might be the 1st day of January, when according to section 20 of article 20 the term would commence on the 8th, and not on the 1st. On the supposition that the provision fixing the length of the term was intended to fix the commencement of it, the two provisions would be repugnant; and on the same supposition section 20 of article 20 is repugnant to all the provisions in the constitution in regard to the terms of all other officers provided for, except railroad commissioner and members of the legislature. Section 2, art. 5, provides: The governor shall hold his office four years "from and after the first Monday after the first day of January," plainly excluding Monday. All the executive officers hold office for the same term as the governor. Section 3, art. 6: "The term of office of the chief justice and the associate justices of the supreme court shall be twelve years from and after the first Monday after the first day of January." These provisions are as clearly repugnant to section 20, art 20, as the provision in regard to superior judges, for they exclude Monday. The only way to reconcile them is to suppose, as no doubt the fact was, that in fixing the length of the term the attention of the convention was not distinctly called to the exact date of the commencement, but the last section was intended to perform this office, and to provide that all officers of the state should take office on the same day. Having provided for this generally, no reason can be imagined for providing a different date for the commencement of the term of superior judges. And very seldom would there be any difference. A calculation made for me shows that the terms of none of Judge Marks' successors in office will commence in a year when Monday will be the 1st day of January until 1945. Certainly a different rule could not have been intended for them from that provided for other officers. And supposing section 6, art. 6, is to control, there would then occasionally happen a time when the term would be more or less than six years, or we would have occasionally two judges legally holding the same office, and occasionally none at all. This would happen whenever the new term commenced on a different day of the month from that on which the old term commenced. On the whole, even if it must be concluded that section 6, art. 6, and section 20, art. 20 are repugnant, the latter must control.

3. Now, was Marks a de facto judge? It appears that he was in fact holding court on that day. Judge Law was before him as an attorney. We must conclude that both believed that Marks' term included Monday; and, as we have seen, the constitution is quite capable of that construction. In fact, if we look only to the provision providing specially for the terms of superior judges, such construction would be inevitable. Under the authorities, which it is unnecessary to criticise, Marks was clearly a judge de facto. State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449; Petersilea v. Stone, 119 Mass. 465; Cromer v. Boinest, 27 S. C. 436, 3 S. E. Rep. 849; Gilliam v. Reddick, 4 Ired. 368; Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423; Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Or. 456, 15 Pac. Rep. 778; Leach v. Cassidy, 23 Ind. 449; State v. Durkee, 12 Kan. 308; Braidy v. Theritt, 17 Kan. 468; Carli v. Rhener, 27 Minn. 292, 7 N. W. Rep. 139; Woodside v. Wagg, 71 Me. 207.

We come now to the questions involving the merits of the case. To the consideration of the motion for a new trial the respondent raises the objection that the notice of intention was not served on Peckerman. This question is identical with that discussed in regard to the notice of appeal, and need not be further considered.

A very serious question is also raised as to the statement of the grounds of the motion, so far as it involves the sufficiency of the evidence. It is admittedly sufficient in its statement as to alleged errors of law excepted to. As I think there is a point which is distinctly raised in these, which could in fact as well have been presented on the judgment roll on the appeal from the judgment, which must be held to be fatal to the judgment and to plaintiff's right to recover at all, it will not be necessary to pursue that matter further.

The court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that the defendant Rosenthal conveyed the mortgaged premises to plaintiff by a deed absolute on its face, and for an expressed consideration of $1,250; that by a contemporaneous agreement, which the evidence shows was not in writing, the conveyance was converted into a mortgage to secure an existing indebtedness, and for future advances, to be made by the bank to A. Rosenthal and S. Peckerman or either of them, and the interest thereon, according to the tenor of any promissory notes thereafter to be given for such indebtedness; that nearly one year after the date of the deed the firm of Rosenthal & Peckerman, and the partners individually, executed to plaintiff two notes to secure the balance for such advances then due. One note was for $600, and the other for $812. Both were due one day from date, and bear interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month. This suit was commenced June 20, 1888. The answers of the defendants admit that the deed was intended as a mortgage, but deny that it was given to secure further advances, and aver that it was to secure the precise sum of $1,250, then borrowed from the bank, which sum they aver had been fully paid before the commencement of this action. Other defenses are pleaded, among them the discharge of both Peckerman and A. Rosenthal in insolvency. It is also shown, and it is so found by the court, that the mortgaged premises, at the time the conveyance was made, composed the homestead of A. Rosenthal and Betsy Rosenthal, which had been carved out of their community property. It was claimed in the court below, and now urged here, that the mortgage, under such circumstances, is void, at least as to future advances. It is also insisted here that the acknowledgment is void because taken before Bates, who was president and manager of the bank, and represented as plaintiff in this action. It has been held that an acknowledgment taken before the grantee of a deed is void. Brown v. Moore, 38 Tex. 645; Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329; Beaman v. Whitney, 20 Me. 413; Wilson v. Traer, 20 Iowa, 231; Stevens v. Hampton, 46 Mo. 404; Proff. Not. § 35. Where the only effect of the acknowledgment is to impart notice by recording the deed, it would seem that, to be void, it must appear on the face of the instrument. Where, however, the acknowledgment is essential to the validity of the deed, I see no reason why the objection would not be as good against an acknowledgment taken before the agent of the grantee as before the grantee himself. However, this objection does not seem to have been made in the court below, and the other point is sufficient. This question need not, therefore, be now decided.

The constitution requires the legislature to protect by law the homestead from forced sale. Section 1, art. 17. Section 1241 of the Civil Code declares that a sale upon foreclosure of a mortgage is a forced sale. It provides: "The homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained. * * * (3) On debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife, or by an unmarried claimant." The next section is as follows: "Sec. 1242. The homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." What character or quality does the law add to the tenure by which the homestead is held as so much property to make it a statutory homestead? I think it must be answered that this consists in the restrictions placed upon the power to alienate or incumber its exemption from forced sale under execution, and in the disposition made of it upon the death of either. If the deed, absolute on its face, could be said to convey the fee, it might perhaps be argued that by it the homestead was destroyed, but the fee did not pass by the deed. It was a mortgage only, both at law and in equity, and could be shown not to be a conveyance whenever any rights were asserted under it. Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. Rep. 4, and 22 Pac. Rep. 186, 549; Locke v. Moulton, (Cal.) 30 Pac. Rep. 957. The premises retained their character as a homestead after the execution of the conveyance; for it is the homestead that may be incumbered, and which may be sold upon a judgment obtained upon a debt secured by a mortgage upon it. I think it proper, also, to call attention to the fact that the word in section 1242 is "incumbered" rather than "mortgaged," thus specifically calling attention to the act which burdens the property. By what, then, is the homestead incumbered? Is it by the conveyance absolute on its face, or by the contemporaneous oral agreement that a debt may be created which shall be an incumbrance upon the homestead, or by both? Plainly it requires both to create the incumbrance,—to burden the estate with a debt. It must therefore follow that the incumbrance here was not created by an instrument executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife; and, if it would be held good for the present indebtedness, would not every new advance be a fresh burden or incumbrance, not created by such instrument? Such a conveyance, even if expressly securing future advancements, would constitute a power in another to incumber at his will. It has been held that the homestead cannot be conveyed by either husband or wife or both, where one acts through an attorney in fact. In Lies v. De Diablar, 12 Cal. 328, it was said that the homestead was for the benefit of the family, including the children; and husband and wife, both together, could dispose of it only as the legislature might authorize. Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 11, holds, as does Flege v. Garvey, 47 Cal. 371, that husband and wife must personally join in the conveyance of the homestead. In Gagliardo v. Dumont, 54 Cal. 496, it was expressly decided that the homestead could not be conveyed by husband and wife when the execution by the husband was through an attorney in fact. It should be noticed that even as to the husband, under the homestead act, the acknowledgment is an essential element in the conveyance. But even if it can be maintained that a mortgage expressly given for further advances in an indefinite amount, and on terms as to time and rate of interest to be agreed upon, by a person other than the mortgagor, would be valid, because it can be argued that it is included in the instrument, it cannot be held so here, for in no way is there any such authority in the instrument executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife. It is contended that the case of Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 Pac. Rep. 808, is opposed to these views. But in that case this point does not appear to have been raised. The property there was the separate property of the wife, and the point discussed was as to the sufficiency of the acknowledgment as a conveyance of the wife's separate property. The deed there also recited that the deed was in trust, the conditions of which were set out in a paper referred to. It was held that the deed was properly acknowledged, notwithstanding the fact that the paper expressing the terms of the trust was not signed until after the deed was so acknowledged. Whether that conclusion was right or wrong does not affect this case. The discussion there was in regard to the statute concerning acknowledgments, and not in regard to the homestead right. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment for the defendants on the findings.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment for the defendants on the findings.

PEOPLE v. MORAN. (No. 20,936.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 12, 1893.)

APPEAL—REHEARING—MISTAKE OF CLERK.

A motion for rehearing made on account of the clerk's failure to record appellant's brief, so as to bring it to the attention of the court, will be denied, where an examination of the brief fails to disclose anything that would justify a reversal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Motion by John Moran to set aside a judgment obtained against him by the people, and for a rehearing. Denied.

For former report, see supra.

Hugh J. & William Crawford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The clerk, by mistake, having failed to make a record of the filing of appellant's brief in the foregoing action, it was not brought to the attention of the court, upon the consideration of the merits of the appeal. Appellant now moves to set aside the judgment and grant a rehearing of the cause for that reason. Upon an examination of the specifications of error relied upon in appellant's brief, we find nothing to justify a reversal of the judgment.

Let the motion be denied.

In re HAAS' ESTATE. (No. 19,107.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1893.)

PROBATE COURTS—JURISDICTION—TITLE TO PROPERTY.

On a final settlement by an executor, a legatee under the will objected, on the ground that the executor had personal property of the estate in his possession, not accounted for. The executor set up that such property did not belong to the estate, and that he held it as guardian of E., a minor, whose property it was. Held that, the legal title to such property being directly in issue, the probate court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine to whom it belonged, and a finding by such court that the property was a part of the estate, and a decree charging the same to the executor in his account, is beyond its power.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

James F. Mooney, executor of Christian P. Haas, deceased, filed his account with the probate court for a final settlement of the estate, and a legatee under the will objected to the settlement on the ground that the executor had personal property of the estate in his possession not accounted for. From a decree charging such property to the executor, he appeals. Reversed.

Chas. L. Batcheller, for appellant. Albert M. Stephens, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by the executor, James F. Mooney, from an order settling his annual account. When the executor filed his account, a legatee under the will objected thereto upon the ground that he had a large sum of money, and also other personal property, in his possession, which was the property of the estate, and for which he had not accounted. In answer to these objections the executor set out that he was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of Ella V. Haas, a minor; that said property was her property, and he held it as such guardian, and had returned it to the court in his inventory and appraisement of her estate; and he thereupon objected to the court's hearing and determining these matters, upon the ground that as a court of probate it had no jurisdiction thereof. The court proceeded to a trial of the issues raised by the pleadings, made findings of fact to the effect that this property was the property of the estate, and by the decree charged the same to the executor in his account.

In the present status of this case the executor occupies a position which is not at all pleasant to him, viewed from a pecuniary standpoint, for he is now charged with this property in the estate of his ward, and also in the estate of the deceased, Haas; and for that reason he has such an interest in the final determination of the appeal as to justify his appearance in this court. But his two positions of trust are in direct antagonism upon the question of property rights involved in this proceeding, and, if it were not for the prospective personal liability against him in one or the other of these estates, he should not be heard here at all, for in representing both trusts he would necessarily misrepresent one. The minor, Ella V. Haas, was not a party to this proceeding in the trial court, and is not a party to this appeal, although the decree of that court which is before us holds this property to be the property of the estate. The necessary effect of this decree is to declare that she has no title therein, for the question of her title was the only issue involved. The executor was not in a position to represent the ward at the trial of that issue, for the reasons already stated; and the affirmance by this court of the judgment of the trial court would in no degree quiet the title to this property as between the respective claimants. The issues raised by the objections of the legatee to the account, and the answer of the executor to such objection, directly involved the question as to where the legal title to this personal property rested, and that was an issue the probate court had no power to hear and determine. There are many matters relating to the estates of deceased persons of which the probate court has no jurisdiction, and the determination of the question of title to property is essentially one of them. When it became apparent from the pleadings that matters of title to property were at issue, such matters should have been left to other courts for determination; care being exercised that all parties interested should be fairly and fully represented at the trial. We think the judgment of the court was one beyond its power, and for that reason let it be reversed, and the cause remanded.

SCHMID v. BUSCH et al. (No. 19,098.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

ENFORCEMENT OF MECHANIC'S LIEN—PAYMENT OF CONTRACTOR IN LAND.

1. In an action to foreclose a laborer's lien, the complaint alleged that on July 6, 1891, defendant owed the contractor, for repairs on his house, money sufficient to pay plaintiff's claim for work done on the house for the contractor. Defendant answered that the contractor agreed to take his pay in land, to be conveyed when the contractor paid him $25 borrowed money, and that he owed the contractor nothing on July 6, 1891, or at any time, under said contract. Plaintiff proved his claim for work, and rested. Held, that the answer denied only that any sum of money was due under the contract, and that, if plaintiff was entitled to any relief under the contract set up and admissions made by defendant, the court erred in granting a nonsuit.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1183, 1184, 1201, providing that laborers shall have a lien for work done, and that the whole contract price, except that part due the contractor, shall be payable in money, without regard to any contract made between the landowner and contractor, the laborer may enforce a lien, though the contract price is less than $1,000, and payable in something other than money, when it remains unpaid at the time the lien is filed and the action begun.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by K. H. Schmid against W. Busch and another to foreclose a laborer's lien. From a judgment of nonsuit as to the lien, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John R. Aitken and A. D. Jordan, for appellant. L. L. Boone and C. F. Humes, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This an action to recover from the defendant Busch the value of certain work and labor, and to foreclose a laborer's lien for the same upon the property of defendant Boone. It is alleged in the complaint that, at all the times named therein, the defendant Boone was the owner and reputed owner of a described lot of land in the city of San Diego, with a frame dwelling house thereon; that on a day named he entered into a contract with the defendant Busch, under and by which Busch was to furnish certain work, labor, and material to be used in the repair of the said dwelling house; that the contract was for less than $1,000, to wit, about $800, and was never recorded in the office of the recorder of San Diego county; that Busch commenced the work of repairing the said house about the 1st of May, 1891, and fully completed the same, under and according to the terms of his contract, on the 6th day of July, 1891, and "that there remains due and unpaid from said defendant B. F. Boone to said defendant W. Busch, upon and for the repair of said dwelling house under said contract, the sum of not less than two hundred dollars, which said sum became due and payable on the 6th day of July, 1891;" that, under a contract with Busch, plaintiff agreed to do and perform work and labor for him in repairing the said house, and under and pursuant to the contract he did perform such work and labor for 40½ days; that Busch agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of his services on demand, as soon as the said repairs were complete, and that the reasonable value thereof was $5 per day, and the total value $202.50; that plaintiff had often demanded payment of the amount due him, but had received only $39.50, leaving still due him and unpaid on account of his work and labor, after deducting all just credits and offsets, the sum of $163. The complaint then sets out the execution and filing for record by the plaintiff of a proper claim of lien upon the house and lot of defendant Boone.

Busch failed to answer, and his default was entered. Boone anwered, and set up a written contract made between himself and Busch, whereby the latter agreed to do certain work in repairing his house, and in consideration of said work he agreed to convey to Busch certain lands situate in the county of San Diego. He then denied that all the work and materials were of the value of $800, or of any greater value than $400, and alleged that all the work and labor done, and all the materials furnished, by Busch in and upon said house, during the period covered by plaintiff's complaint, were done and furnished under the contract above set out; denied that any sum was due from him to Busch on the 6th day of July, 1891, or at any other time, or at all, pursuant to said contract or otherwise; alleged that on the 19th day of June, 1891, he loaned to Busch the sum of $25, and that Busch then made a written agreement, which was attached to the contract before set out, and by which he agreed to repay the sum loaned, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, and also agreed that the lands described in the attached contract might be held by Boone as security for said sum, and the latter should be under no obligation to convey the same until said sum should be paid; and, further, that the said sum had not been paid, nor any part thereof. At the trial the plaintiff proved that he performed labor on the house of Boone, under a contract with Busch, and the amount and value thereof, as stated in his complaint; but he offered no evidence as to the terms of the contract between the owner and contractor, or that there was any contract between them. He then rested his case, and the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground "that there has been no evidence to show, or tending to show, that there ever was at any time, either at the time alleged in the complaint, or any other time, anything due under any contract, or otherwise, from the owner of this building to the contractor Busch." The court took the motion under advisement for a time, and subsequently granted it, and from the judgment thereupon entered the plaintiff appeals.

In support of the judgment it is claimed by respondent that, to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, it was necessary for him to prove that a contract, substantially the same as that stated in the complaint, was entered into between the owner and contractor, and that a sum of money remained due thereunder from the former to the latter sufficient to meet the plaintiff's demand; and that, no such proof having been made, the nonsuit was properly granted. The answer does not deny that a valid contract was entered into between the parties for the work in question, but, on the contrary, it sets up a written contract, which is not materially different from the one stated in the complaint, except that the work was to be paid for by conveyance of land. The answer also, in effect, admitted that the value of the work to be performed was $400, and that that sum, less $25, had not been paid by a transfer of the land or otherwise. The denial, therefore, "that any sum was due from him to said Busch on the 6th day of July, 1891, or at any other time, or at all, pursuant to said contract or otherwise," must be treated as a denial only that any sum of money was due under the contract. Under these circumstances, we think, the plaintiff could rest upon the contract set up and the admissions made by the defendant; and, if under them he was entitled to any relief, then the court erred in granting the nonsuit.

It is further claimed by respondent that the plaintiff had no lien, and was not entitled to any relief, as against him, because the contract price of the work to be done by the contractor was less than $1,000, and was payable in property other than money; and this seems to have been the view taken by the court below. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "all persons and laborers of every class, performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in," the construction, alteration, or repair of any building, "shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done and materials furnished." Section 1184 provides that "as to all liens, except that of the contractor, the whole contract price shall be payable in money;" and section 1201 provides "that it shall not be competent for the owner and contractor, or either of them, by any term of their contract, or otherwise, to waive, affect, or impair the claims and liens of other persons, whether with or without notice, except by their written consent, and any term to that effect shall be null and void." Respondent contends that sections 1183 and 1184, above cited, relate only to cases where the contract price exceeds $1,000, and hence that they do not in any way sustain and justify the claim of appellant; and, in support of this position, Sidlinger v. Kerkow, 82 Cal. 42, 22 Pac. Rep. 932, and Lumber Co. v. Cummings, 86 Cal. 22, 24 Pac. Rep. 814, are cited. After carefully reading the opinions in the cases referred to, we fail to see how they can be said to sustain respondent's contention. It is true that the sections named were commented upon and construed with reference to the questions there involved, but those qustions were entirely different from the one presented here. Contractors' and laborers' liens have many times been foreclosed when the contract price was less than $1,000, and in such a case, and under the sections of the Code above cited, the laborer, in our opinion, may enforce a lien, notwithstanding the contract price was to be paid in something other than money; it not having been in fact paid when the claim of lien was filed and the action commenced. It follows that the nonsuit was improperly granted, and that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PIO v. AIGELTNIER. (No. 15,097.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1892.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—CERTIFICATE OF CLERK.

1. Under Court Rule 6, providing that, on a motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file the transcript, there shall be presented a certificate of the clerk below, stating the date of entry, the amount and the character of the judgment, notice of the appeal, and the court to which the appeal is taken, a certificate of the clerk of a superior court, giving the date of entry, the amount and the character of the judgment, and then stating "that, after the rendition of said judgment, the said defendant filed a notice of appeal in said action" is sufficient to indicate from what judgment, and to what court, the appeal is taken.

2. In such case a request to file an additional certificate is not an abandonment of the right to have the motion to dismiss determined on the original certificate.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by one Pio against one Aigeltnier. From an order dismissing an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, defendant files a motion to set aside the dismissal order. Motion denied.

Bert Schlesinger, for appellant. G. S. Langan, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendant appealed from the judgment of the superior court on November 19, 1891. On June 17, 1892, he procured an order granting him 15 days from the last-named date, within which to serve and file his transcript. On July 8, 1892, the respondent served a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that no transcript had been filed, and that the time for filing the same had elapsed. The transcript was filed on July 13, 1892. At the hearing of the motion, counsel for the appellant objected to the sufficiency of the certificate of the clerk presented by the respondent. No ruling was made on the objection, but counsel for respondent stated that he would file another certificate. The appellant objected to the filing of any additional certificate, claiming that the motion must be determined upon the certificate on file. On the following day this court, regarding the certificate filed as sufficient, and the appellant without excuse for the delay, granted the motion to dismiss. Thereafter the appellant filed and served a notice of motion to set aside the order dismissing the appeal on the grounds that the first certificate was insufficient; that, before the order dismissing the appeal was made, counsel for respondent waived his right to have the motion determined on the clerk's certificate then on file, and had no right to file the additional certificate after the hearing of the motion to dismiss.

Our rules provide that the transcript shall be filed and served within 40 days after the appeal is perfected, and, if not filed within that time, the appeal may be dismissed on motion, upon notice given; that, on motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript within the prescribed time, there shall be presented the certificate of the clerk below, stating certain enumerated things. Rule 6. The only fault found with the certificate first presented is that it did not state what judgment or order of the superior court the appellant had appealed from, nor to what court he had appealed. The certificate gives the date of the entry of judgment, the amount and character of the judgment, and immediately thereafter states "that, after the rendition of said judgment, the said defendant filed a notice of appeal in said action," etc. This is sufficient. There was but one appeal taken, and the appellant could not have been misled. It would be entirely superfluous to state in a certificate that the appeal was taken to this court; there could be no appeal to any other court from a judgment or order of the superior court. Furthermore, the right of the respondent to have the appeal dismissed does not depend upon the filing of a certificate before the transcript is filed or the motion is heard, and there is no reason why we should not consider the amended certificate if it were material.

Respondent's request to file an additional certificate was not an abandonment of his right to have his motion determined on the original certificate; it was merely an offer to produce additional evidence to overcome appellant's objections. The rule provides that if the transcript, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time the notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion. Rule 5. The certificate is merely the evidence of certain facts which the rule requires the respondent to present on the hearing of the motion.

The affidavits filed on behalf of the respective parties show that the appellant is without excuse for his failure to file the transcript within time. There was an attempt to compromise after the notice of appeal was filed, but the appellant was informed by counsel for the respondent, repeatedly and emphatically, that he would accept no less than a certain amount in satisfaction of the judgment. Motion denied.

CHAPMAN v. BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

(No. 14,158.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 12, 1893.)

Accounting—Laches—Parties.

1. In an action brought in March, 1889, for an accounting, it appeared that in October, 1875, plaintiff, being indebted to a bank, executed a deed of lands by a conveyance absolute in form, but as security for the indebtedness; that in August, 1876, this indebtedness and the conveyances were assigned to defendant; that in September, 1876, plaintiff, being largely indebted to defendant, executed several notes to the amount of his indebtedness, payable to one F., who was also indebted to defendant, and which were by F. indorsed to defendant; that, at the same time, F. executed several notes to the amount of his indebtedness, which notes were payable to plaintiff, and were by him indorsed to defendant; that in November, 1876, the defendant executed to plaintiff and F. an instrument designated as a "deed of trust," in which defendant declared that it held all the land assigned it by the bank as security for these notes; that in September, 1879, plaintiff conveyed the lands in fee simple in payment of his indebtedness to defendant, who canceled the debt, and surrendered to him his promissory notes, as well as those of F. Held, that plaintiff's right of action, if any, was barred by his laches and the statute of limitations.

2. In such case, a contention by plaintiff that he is entitled to the proceeds of a sale by defendant of lands conveyed to defendant by F. as security for the notes will not be considered on appeal, where F. is not made a party defendant, and where there is no prayer in the bill asking for such relief.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by one Chapman against the Bank of California for an accounting upon conveyances of realty. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for respondent.

Paterson, J. The findings of the court below disclose the nature of the action and relief sought. They are in substance as follows: In October, 1875, the plaintiff executed and delivered to McKinley, Glenny, and Latham, conveyances of certain real estate, comprising 20,041 acres, undivided, in a larger tract of 86,000, situated in the counties of Kern and Tulare, and at the same time conveyed certain other lands belonging to him, comprising 38,134 acres, situated in the counties of Fresno, Merced, Stanislaus, and Mariposa. About the same time he conveyed to McKinley and Glenny about 26,330 acres situated in the counties of Alameda, San Mateo, Santa Cruz, Solano, Napa, Merced, Fresno, San Luis Obispo, and San Francisco. These conveyances, though absolute in form, were intended and accepted merely as security for the payment of certain indebtedness due from the plaintiff to the Bank of British North America. Thereafter said indebtedness, so secured, was assigned to the defendant, and on August 28, 1876, McKinley, Glenny, and Latham conveyed to the defendant all the lands transferred to them as aforesaid. In September, 1876, the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $214,523.97, and Isaac Friedlander was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $500,358.46. The plaintiff executed six promissory notes in divers sums, aggregating his indebtedness to the defendant, which were made payable to Friedlander, and by the latter indorsed and delivered to the defendant. At the same time Friedlander executed six promissory notes, aggregating the amount of his indebtedness to the defendant, which were made payable to the plaintiff, and by him indorsed and delivered to the defendant. On November 25, 1876, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff and Friedlander an instrument designated as a "declaration of trust," in which it declared that it held all of the lands conveyed by McKinley, Glenny, and Latham as security for the payment of said 12 promissory notes. In August, 1879, "the plaintiff, overwhelmed with debt, and unable to meet his liabilities, at the Bank of California and to others, proposed to and urged the Bank of California to make a settlement with him, and to take all the said lands then held in security, in fee simple absolute, in discharge and full satisfaction of said indebtedness." The bank agreed to this settlement, and accepted the plaintiff's proposition. On September 6, 1879, in pursuance of the agreement, and to carry out the settlement, the plaintiff delivered to the bank 10 deeds, (including the conveyance for the 20,041 acres of land which had been set off to the plaintiff out of the 86,000-acre tract,) absolute in form, conveying to the defendant all of said lands, and the bank thereupon canceled and discharged all of said indebtedness, and surrendered the 12 promissory notes to the plaintiff, who has ever since held the same. Said 10 conveyances were not executed to secure, and were not intended to secure, said indebtedness, or any part thereof, but were executed by plaintiff to the bank in full satisfaction and payment of all his indebtedness. No part of the lands was ever sold by the bank until after the delivery of said 10 deeds. There was no fraud, oppression, or unfairness on the part of the bank. The settlement was fair, and for a full consideration. At the time of said settlement the plaintiff made and delivered to the bank a promissory note for $20,000, payable two years after date. This note was never secured by any of the deeds, nor in any manner. Plaintiff never paid the note, but after its maturity, in 1881, the bank surrendered the note to the plaintiff. Plaintiff never complained of the transaction, and never informed the defendant in any way that he was not satisfied with the settlement, until April, 1887, when he demanded an accounting. The court further found that the allegations of the answer relating to the intention of the parties, and the nature of the transaction between them, were true. It was found that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by his laches, and by the provisions of sections 318 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff moved for a new trial. The motion was denied, and from the order and the judgment he has appealed.

The findings cover all the material issues, and we think they are supported by the evidence. The question is discussed in the briefs at great length, as to whether the bank, under the McKinley et al. deeds and the so-called declaration of trust, was a mortgagee or a trustee, but, in view of the conclusion we have reached on another question, we do not deem it necessary to determine whether the appellant's contention in that regard is sound or not. We think that a complete answer to the appellant's claim for relief—except in so far as it relates to the Friedlander lands, at least—is found in the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations and laches. The 10 deeds were delivered to the bank in August, 1879, and a final settlement was completed on September 6, 1879, when the bank surrendered the 12 notes to the plaintiff, and discharged the indebtedness. Mr. Chapman's intention to give the notes and convey the property in fee simple to the bank is found by the court, and the finding is supported by the evidence. The settlement was not brought about through any importunities on behalf of the defendant, but through the earnest solicitation of the plaintiff himself. In his letter to the bank, prior to the settlement, he stated that it was needless for him to say that if he could not free himself from the burden resting upon him, he might as well give up the struggle, and that his indebtedness to the bank was of such magnitude, and so publicly known, that it destroyed his credit. His proposition was accepted, and, although a new note of $20,000 was given by him to the bank, no attempt was ever made to claim it, and it was finally surrendered to him without payment. The note was given without consideration, and never could have been collected by the bank. If there was any consideration for it, it was an unlawful one. The finding of the court, therefore, that the conduct of the bank was not unconscionable or oppressive, is fully sustained by the evidence. Defendant's action was based upon the express request of the plaintiff, who was at the time embarrassed financially, and believed that his only escape from utter ruin was the acceptance by the bank of his proposal. Conceding that the McKinley et al. deeds and the defeasance created an express trust, such trust was terminated by the final settlement of September 6, 1879. It was expressly understood and agreed that the plaintiff was to convey the title of the lands in payment of the indebtedness. If any trust arose under the 10 deeds of 1879 it was an implied trust, and plaintiff's remedy was barred four years after the settlement and delivery of the deeds and notes, (section 343, Code Civil Proc.,) and, regardless of the question as to whether there has been a plea of the statute of limitations, a court of equity will refuse to entertain a suit brought after unreasonable delay, (Harris v. Hillegass, 66 Cal. 79, 4 Pac. Rep. 987; Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 287, 14 Pac. Rep. 791.) The refusal to grant relief is not put upon the presumption of payment or analogy to the statute of limitations, but upon considerations of public policy, and the difficulty of doing entire justice between the parties in consequence of the unreasonable delay. The principal factors in determining whether the plaintiff had been guilty of laches are acquiescence and lapse of time; but other circumstances are also material, such as that a change in the value or character of the property has taken place. The matter is one which is left to the sound discretion of the chancellor in each case. The learned judge of the court below found that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by his laches, and the finding must stand. The plaintiff never intimated any dissatisfaction with the final settlement until nearly eight years after the same had been effected, when for the first time it was claimed that the 10 deeds had been given merely as additional security; and it was not until March 11, 1889, that the plaintiff, by his amendment to his complaint, claimed that the deeds were delivered in consideration of the cancellation of the indebtedness, and "that by reason of the circumstances * * * and of plaintiff's helpless situation, he was compelled to submit to said agreement." If plaintiff was imposed upon, it is incredible that he did not discover it earlier than he did.

Plaintiff was aware of the sales that were being made, and made frequent inquiries in regard to the same. He has allowed the bank to pay taxes on the lands ever since the settlement; has never offered to return any of the notes surrendered to him by the bank, or to pay the interest or any part of the principal, nor has he ever requested any extension of time for such payment. In the meantime the notes which were surrendered to him had become barred by the statute of limitations. A party who sleeps upon his rights so long has no equity. His claim is stale, and the court will not enforce it. Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. Rep. 868.

Appellant contends that he is entitled to the value of the Friedlander lands, or at least to the proceeds of the sale, with interest thereon. The court below made no finding with respect to the Friedlander lands, and treated the action as one in which the plaintiff was seeking an accounting and redemption as to his own lands only, and not for subrogation to and enforcement of the rights of the bank in the land conveyed by Friedlander as further security. There is no description of the Friedlander lands in the complaint,—simply a reference in one of the schedules to the deeds of conveyance made by Friedlander to the bank, giving the names of the grantor and grantee, date of the deed, date of recordation, and volume and page of the record. Perhaps this would be a sufficient description, however, as the plaintiff does not claim a conveyance of the land, but only an accounting for the value of the proceeds of the land, which has already been sold by the bank. As there was no prayer for such relief, and the record did not disclose to the court below that this particular claim was made, we think the contention comes too late. Friedlander's representative would be an indispensable party to an action in which plaintiff desired such relief, and plaintiff ought to have made him a party defendant herein, and by direct allegation called the attention of the court to the facts upon which he claimed the right to an accounting as to the proceeds of the Friedlander lands.

Judgment and order affirmed.

GUMPEL v. CASTAGNETTO et ux. (No. 14,394.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1892.)

Appeal—Record—Mortgages.

1. Where an appeal is taken from an order denying a motion by defendants for a new trial, it is not proper practice for plaintiff to move to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the notice of motion for new trial was not given in time, but such objection to the notice may properly be considered on the hearing of the appeal.

2. Plaintiff accepted service of defendants' notice of motion for a new trial, "reserving the objection that the notice is not served within the time allowed by law," and also objected to the settlement of defendants' bill of exceptions on the ground that the notice was not served and filed, or either, in the time allowed by law. Held, that the objection to such notice was properly presented and preserved.

3. In a proceeding to compel defendants to reconvey certain land conveyed by plaintiff to defendants, a complaint which alleges that, when plaintiff signed the deed, she was led by defendants to believe that it was simply a mortgage to secure a loan made by them to her, and that she had no intention to make an absolute conveyance, is sufficient to support a decree for the reconveyance, on repayment of the loan, though the complaint also charges that defendants procured the conveyance to them by fraud.

4. The fact that plaintiff was by the decree compelled to pay more than the amount named in the complaint is no ground of complaint for defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action brought by Helena Gumpel, in which A. C. Freese was substituted as plaintiff, to compel G. Castagnetto and wife to reconvey certain land to her. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order overruling a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, for appellants.

Plaintiff did not properly present and preserve her objecion to defendants' motion for a new trial. Cottle v. Leitch, 43 Cal. 322; Hobbs v. Duff, Id. 492; Quivey v. Gambert, 32 Cal. 304; Gray v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 220; Hegard v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 536, 14 Pac. Rep. 180.

J. D. Sullivan, J. H. Whittemore, and H. H. Lowenthal, for respondent.

McFarland, J. Judgment went in the trial court for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. Respondent objects to the consideration of the points made by appellants on their appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and moves to dismiss said appeal, upon the ground that the notice of motion for a new trial was not given in time. The motion to dismiss, in such case, has been held not to be proper practice; but the objection to the notice of motion is a proper matter for consideration on the hearing of the appeal. Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 92 Cal. 155, 28 Pac. Rep. 221. As was said in Quivey v. Gambert, 32 Cal. 309: "If the notice and statement, or either of them, is not filed in time, he [respondent] may safely rely upon such facts as fatal to the motion, when brought to a hearing." Where the notice of motion has not been filed in time, and respondent presents his objection to it at the proper time, and in the proper manner, an order denying the new trial will be affirmed here, without looking further into the record.

Appellants contend that in the case at bar respondent did not properly present and preserve her objection to the notice, but we think otherwise. The decree was entered January 29, 1890. It refers to a decision rendered December 9, 1889; but as findings were waived, and none made, the reference must have been to some oral statement of the judge of what the judgment would be. On the day of the rendition of the decree, the attorney of plaintiff served on attorney for defendants the following notice: "You will please take notice that a decree, a copy of which is herewith served upon you, has been this day entered in this action, in accordance with the decision rendered by the above court on the 9th day of December, 1889, that defendants reconvey the premises,” etc.,—giving the substance of the decree. This was a sufficient notice, under section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. More than 10 days thereafter, on February 12, 1890, defendants served on plaintiff a notice of intention to move for a new trial; and the bill of exceptions shows affirmatively “that previous to said 12th day of February, 1890, the time to serve and file a notice of intention to move for a new trial in this action had not been extended by an order of the court, or otherwise.” Counsel for plaintiff accepted service of the notice, with this reservation “Reserving the objection that the within notice is not served within the time allowed by law.” The bill of exceptions further shows as follows: “That thereafter, and before the settlement of the foregoing bill of exceptions, and at the time of presenting her amendments thereto, the plaintiff objected to the settlement of said bill of exceptions on the following grounds: (1) That the notice of intention to move for a new trial, served and filed in this action, was not served and filed, or either, within the time allowed by law. (2) That the defendants did not prepare and serve their bill of exceptions to be used upon the hearing of said motion within the time allowed by law. (3) That the court overruled the objections aforesaid to said bill of exceptions, and to the settlement thereof, and allowed the same, to which ruling plaintiff excepted.” And it is difficult to imagine what more plaintiff could have done to preserve her rights in the premises. The cases cited by appellant merely hold that, if a party desires to take advantage of the failure of his opponent to give notice of a motion for a new trial in time, he must not indulge in acts or omissions which will amount to a waiver of that advantage, and that if he file amendments to a statement or bill of exceptions, and proceeds to its settlement, without protest, it will be presumed either that the time for giving the notice had been properly extended, or that objection on that score had been waived. But no case can be found where such a presumption has been indulged upon a state of facts like that presented by the record in the case at bar. It does not appear upon what ground the court below denied the motion for a new trial. It may be that it was denied upon the objection to the notice, and that the trial judge nevertheless settled the bill of exceptions in accordance with certain intimations of this court that such is the better practice, so that the whole matter may be reviewed on one appeal, and a writ of mandate or other independent proceeding or appeal avoided. See Quivey v. Gambert, supra. At all events, the order denying the motion for a new trial must be affirmed, for the reasons above given.

2. The only other question is, does the complaint warrant the decree? And we think that it does. The purpose of the complaint is to procure a decree compelling defendants to reconvey to plaintiff a certain city lot, formerly conveyed by her to defendants, by a deed absolute in form. The decree adjudges that the conveyance was made to defendants as security for certain moneys, and that defendants reconvey the same upon the payment of such moneys. It is true that the complaint contains certain charges of fraud against defendants, by which it is alleged plaintiff was induced to make the conveyance; but it is also averred that she understood that it was given as security for $400, and “that this plaintiff never intended to make or execute a conveyance absolute to defendants, or to either of them, but was led to believe by them that such paper, so purporting to be a deed, as aforesaid, was simply a mortgage to secure the said payment of said $400 to defendants, as aforesaid.” These averments, we think, support the decree. The fact that the judgment compels the plaintiff to pay defendants more than the amount named in the complaint is something of which defendants cannot complain. Judgment and order affirmed.

JACKS v. BALDEZ et al. (No. 14,424.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1892.)

VACATING JUDGMENT — NOTICE OF OVERRULING DEMURRER.

A judgment cannot be set aside on motion on the ground that the moving parties were not served with notice of the decision of the court overruling their demurrer to the complaint, and allowing them 20 days to answer, for under Code Civil Proc. § 473, a judgment can only be vacated on motion when its invalidity is apparent from an inspection of the judgment roll; and section 670, which provides what documents shall constitute the judgment roll, makes no mention of any paper proving service of the notice of decision overruling a demurrer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; John K. Alexander, Judge.

Action by David Jacks against Carlos Baldez and others. From an order setting aside a judgment entered in his favor, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. O. Houghton, W. M. R. Parker, and B. V. Sargent, (Charles E. Mongues, of counsel,) for appellant. R. M. F. Soto, for respondents.

Garoutte, J. This is an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment. The motion was made 11 months after the judgment was entered, and was based upon the grounds that the moving parties, the defendants, were not served with notice of the decision of the court overruling their demurrer to the complaint, and allowing them 20 days to answer. The motion to set aside and vacate this judgment was not made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, aside from the power there granted, a judgment can only be vacated upon motion when it is void upon its face. Moore v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 495, 25 Pac. Rep.

22. A judgment is void upon its face when that fact is made apparent by an inspection of the judgment roll. People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 609, 24 Pac. Rep. 311. Respondents' motion was based upon the fact that they received no notice of the decision of the court in overruling the demurrer, and giving time to answer. Under section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides what documents shall constitute the judgment roll, we find no mention of any paper proving service of the notice of decision upon an order overruling a demurrer. In Catanich v. Hayes, 52 Cal. 338, the court said: "The notice of the overruling of the demurrer to the complaint, if one was given, would not, of itself, form part of the judgment roll." It follows that at the time the motion to set aside the judgment was granted the judgment was not void upon its face, for a judgment roll was presented, which, upon inspection, appears to be complete and entire in all its parts. The motion not having been made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the judgment not being void upon its face, it follows that the order of the court in setting it aside was erroneous. Let the order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

ROUSSET v. REAY et al. (No. 14,368.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1893.)

Ejectment—Alias Writ of Possession—Adverse Possession.

1. Plaintiff having obtained judgment in ejectment, a writ of possession was issued and executed in 1882 against defendants and one M., who was not a party to the suit, and a few months later M. re-entered, and remained thereafter in exclusive possession. In 1889, plaintiff moved for an alias writ of possession against defendants and M. Held, that M. could show on such motion that he was not a member of defendants' family, and that his possession was open and notorious, and that he was the owner of the premises in dispute, and was not a party to the ejectment suit.

2. Where M.'s possession was adverse for more than six years from the time of his re-entry, and ripened into a new title, it could not be affected by the former judgment.

3. A motion for an alias writ of possession should not be entertained where the lapse of time after re-entry is sufficient to create a title in an adverse possessor, and bar an action of ejectment.

4. Where judgment for plaintiff in ejectment is fully executed by putting plaintiff in possession, an alias writ of possession cannot issue except upon an adjudication that the person against whom the writ is to run is guilty of a contempt. Huerstal v. Muir, 2 Pac. Rep. 33, 64 Cal. 450, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Ejectment by Paul Rousset against Joseph W. Reay and others and William McGrath. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for an alias writ of possession, William McGrath appeals. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Smith & Murasky and J. F. Smith, for respondents.

Haynes, C. Appeal from an order granting a motion for an alias writ of possession. In 1873, Rousset recovered judgment in ejectment against Peter McGrath and three other defendants for the possession of certain lands, and that judgment was affirmed on appeal in May, 1882. 60 Cal. 328. August 24, 1882, a writ of possession was issued thereon, which was fully executed August 28, 1882, and under which appellant, among others, was removed from the premises. In November, 1882, appellant, who was not a party to the ejectment suit, re-entered upon the premises, and took possession for himself, and ever since has remained in the exclusive possession. Frederick Hess and Patrick Slater, the successors in interest of Rousset, the plaintiff, moved the court in said cause for an alias writ of possession against appellant and two others, neither of whom were defendants in the ejectment suit. The order was granted, and appellant took a bill of exceptions presenting the facts.

The appellant offered to prove by his own testimony the following: "(1) That at the time of the commencement of this action, to wit, on the 5th of June, 1873, and for a long time prior thereto, he, the said William McGrath, was in the open and notorious possession of said premises, claiming to own the same, and that he was the owner thereof. (2) That he was not, and is not, a party to this action, and that ever since his re-entry upon said premises, (in November, 1882,) as aforesaid, as well as during all the period from and prior to the commencement of this action, down to the time of his ejection under said writ, he claimed, held, and possessed said premises in his own right, and under his own independent title. (3) That he was not a member of his father's (Peter McGrath's) family at the time of the commencement of this action, nor at any time since." To each of these offers Hess and Slater objected on the ground of irrelevancy and immateriality, and the objections were each sustained by the court, and the evidence excluded.

The court erred in not permitting appellant to prove the facts which he offered to prove, as it would have shown that he occupied no such relation to the defendants as to justify his dispossession under the writ. Appellant further contends that, if respondents' rights were otherwise plain, they have slept on it too long to invoke this summary remedy.

The judgment was affirmed in March, 1882, and this motion was made in January, 1889. The writ of possession was executed and appellant dispossessed in August, 1882, and appellant re-entered in November 1882, and was in possession more than six years after his re-entry,—a period more than sufficient to quiet title by adverse possession; and if the possession were adverse, as it may have been, and had ripened into a title, it was then a new title, which could not be affected by the former judgment. Without undertaking to fix a limitation as to the time within which proceedings of this character generally may be taken, but confining ourselves to cases where the proceeding is taken against one who was not a party to the judgment, there can be no doubt that, where the lapse of time after the re-entry is sufficient to create a title in an adverse possessor and bar an action of ejectment, the motion should not be entertained. It is not necessary to consider, and we do not decide, whether in any case under section 1210, Code Civil Proc., an alias writ can issue after the judgment becomes dormant. In the case at bar, as we have seen, the judgment having been fully executed by putting the plaintiff in possession, an alias writ could not issue except upon an adjudication that appellant was guilty of a contempt, and there was no such adjudication. The order, as made, was simply that an alias writ issue, and that seems to have been the sole object of the motion. Appellant here occupied a situation precisely similar to that occupied by Elizabeth Muir and Peter Baker in the case of Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450, 2 Pac. Rep. 33, where an appeal from a similar order was entertained. The exclusion of the evidence offered by appellant requires a reversal of the order, but we think the facts disclosed by the evidence put in by Hess and Slater, the moving parties, show that the motion should not be entertained. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be reversed, with a direction to the court below to dismiss the motion.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, with a direction to the court below to dismiss the motion.

FALLS v. SAN FRANCISCO & N. P. R. CO.

(No. 14,110.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1893.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER AT STATION—OBSTRUCTED PLATFORM.

In an action to recover for injuries received on the platform at one of defendant railroad company's stations, plaintiff testified that there were about 100 people at the station, returning from a picnic; that, as the train approached, plaintiff passed along the platform to reach the rear end of a car she intended to board, and tripped against some milk cans which were lying on the platform, and fell. Plaintiff testified that when she fell she was looking to see where she could get on the train, that it was perfectly light at the time, and that the cans were about 30 feet from where she had been sitting, but she did not see them until she stumbled over them. It appeared that the station was only a flag station; that defendant kept no agent there; that there were daily shipments of milk from the station, the empty cans being returned the following day; that there was no other place than on the platform where the cans could conveniently be left; and that they were near the middle of the platform, with room enough to pass on either side. Held, that the accident could not have been reasonably anticipated by defendant, and therefore the failure to remove the obstructions did not constitute actionable negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Action by Amelia S. Falls against the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hassett & Tevlin, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff upon the defendant's platform at Reed's station, Marin county. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $7,500, and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant appealed from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff testified that on the 19th day of May, 1888, she went from San Francisco to Reed's station, to attend a Sunday school picnic. She returned to the station about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and sat on the side of the platform until the train came along on its way from San Rafael to Tiburon. While waiting for the train, about 100 people who attended the picnic were passing up and down the platform and sitting along on the ties. As the train approached, she arose, and, while passing along the platform to reach the rear end of a car which she intended to board, she tripped against something, and fell. As she fell she noticed that the obstacles were milk cans fastened together. Upon attempting to rise, she found it impossible to do so, and subsequently discovered that she had sustained a fracture of the pelvis and dislocation of the left hip. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that she did not know how far she walked after she arose from the side of the platform, and she could not tell how many people were upon the platform at the time, but they seemed to be all around her. When asked as to how far along the platform she could see as she was walking, she replied that she was not looking at the platform at all, but was looking to see where she could get on the car; that she might have been in a little hurry, but did not know; that the cars were perfectly still at the time; that when the crowd started to go aboard she followed; that it was perfectly light at the time; that the cans were lying about 30 feet from the place where she had been sitting, but she did not see them till she stumbled over them. At the station there is a wooden building, 14 by 24 feet, with a platform in front of it, extending to the first rail, and 30 feet in length. Between the rails of the track nearest the building the space is planked the same length as the platform attached to the station. Adjoining this there is a raised platform, 5 feet in width and 183 feet in length, raised 8 inches above the cross-ties. The station is one where trains stop for passengers or freight only upon receiving flag signals. The company keeps no agent there, and all freight received is left on the platform by the consignor, and taken up by the conductor, and billed as per marks and instructions thereon. It is left upon the platform until the consignees take it away. There is a daily shipment of butter and milk from this station to the city. It is received at 6:20 A. M. and 5 P. M., and the empty cans and boxes are returned from San Francisco at 9:20 A. M. and 6:15 P. M. of the following day. The evidence shows that the cans could not conveniently be left at any other place than on the platform. The milk cans and butter boxes are carried in the baggage car. At the time of the accident there were upon the platform two or more butter boxes, and some milk cans alongside of them. The cans and boxes were about the middle of the platform, with room enough to pass upon either side,—more room between the packages and the car than on the other side. The butter boxes were 2½ feet wide, 3 feet long, and 12 or 14 inches high.

The foregoing is the substance of all the testimony introduced, except that relating to the character of the plaintiff's injuries and her sufferings.

The negligence complained of consists in the alleged failure of the defendant "to provide sufficient and safe access through and along the same [station] to its said cars, to wit, by allowing obstructions to be and remain therein," and the question is whether, upon the facts shown, the defendant was guilty of negligence. It is claimed by the appellant that, if negligence be conceded, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is clearly shown, and for that reason she cannot recover; but, in view of our conclusion upon the question of defendant's negligence, it is unnecessary to pass upon that contention. In Thompson's Carriers of Passengers it is said, (page 104:) "The carrier's liability in respect of the condition of his premises is neither greater nor less than that of any person to another, who by invitation or inducement, express or implied, has come upon his premises for the purpose of transacting business. A duty of protection is owed to such persons by the carrier, but it is needless to remark that this does not amount to a warranty of the safe condition of the premises; neither is the carrier held bound to bestow upon their condition that extraordinary degree of vigilance which the law, from motives of the soundest policy, imposes upon upon him in regard to the carriage of his passengers. The passenger while in actual progress upon his journey is exposed to countless hazards, gives himself wholly in charge of the carrier. * * * But a rule properly ceases with the reason for it; therefore, as a passenger's entrance to the carrier's station is characterized by none of the hazards incident to the journey itself, the rigor of the rule above announced is justly relaxed, in that at such a time and place the carrier is bound to exercise only a reasonable degree of care for the protection of his passengers." Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 242, 3 N. E. Rep. 874. "The rule in such cases is that the carrier is bound simply to exercise ordinary care in view of the dangers to be apprehended." Kelly v. Railroad Co., 112 N. Y. 443, 20 N. E. Rep. 383. Whether there has been an exercise of such care depends upon the circumstances of the case,—the nature of the road and the character of the traffic and place where the accident occurred. Thus it has been held that "at a mere way or flag station, where trains do not regularly stop for the reception and discharge of passengers, and only stop when they are flagged, or to discharge a special passenger, a passenger need not expect or rely upon the company's having furnished a platform or other convenient place for the reception and discharge of passengers." Railroad Co v. Peters, 80 Ind. 172. Accommodations of the same character cannot be expected in the cities and at way stations. Flag stations like the one under consideration are established for the convenience of the inhabitants of sparsely settled territories as well as for the benefit of the company, and would have to be discontinued if the railroad companies were required to keep and maintain freight and passenger depots, with agents to care for the same. At such stations the companies have the right to use the platform for depositing freight and for the accommodation of passengers. Railway Co. v. Canman, 52 Ark. 525, 13 S. W. Rep. 280. The only question is, therefore, whether the defendant, acting as a reasonable person would under the circumstances, ought to have foreseen that such an accident might have happened. If such an accident might reasonably have been anticipated by the defendant, the failure to remove the obstructions constituted actionable negligence; "for negligence, in a legal sense, is no more than this: the failure to observe, for the protection of the interests of another person, that degree of care, precaution, and vigilance which the circumstances justly demand, whereby such other person suffers injury." Barrett v. Southern Pac. Co., 91 Cal. 302, 27 Pac. Rep. 666. We do not think it can be fairly said that the defendant ought to have anticipated that an accident would occur in broad daylight in consequence of leaving the packages on the platform. "The company, as held in some cases, cannot be expected to treat its passengers as children, or to put them under restraint. Passengers must take the responsibility of informing themselves concerning the everyday incidents of railway traveling, and the company could do business upon no other basis." Malcom v. Railroad Co., 106 N. C. 64, 11 S. E. Rep. 187. It is the duty of railroad companies to give their passengers a reasonable time and opportunity to approach and leave their trains, and the duty is reciprocal. Passengers owe it to themselves and to the company to act with reasonable care in alighting from and boarding trains. McDonald v. Railroad Co., 116 N. Y. 548, 22 N. E. Rep. 1068; Railroad Co. v. Lyons, 129 Pa. St. 119, 18 Atl. Rep. 759. In Cornman v. Railroad Co., 4 Hurl. & N. 781, it appeared that the company had on its platform, standing against the pillar which pasengers passed in going to and from the train, a portable weighing machine, the foot of which was elevated about six inches above the level of the platform. Plaintiff was at the station on Christmas day, inquiring for a parcel, when he was driven by the crowd against the machine, in which his foot became entangled, and was injured. The court held that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, the machine being located where it might easily have been seen, and the accident not being one which could have been reasonably anticipated. Reported in Thomp. Carr. p. 76. In Stokes v. Railroad Co., 107 N. C. 178, 11 S. E. Rep. 991, it appeared that the bridge across a ditch leading to the defendant's track was in good condition, except that one plank was slightly shorter than the other. The plaintiff in the daytime attempted to get on the train, but stepped into the hole caused by the short plank, and was injured. The court held that it was not actionable negligence. The case is a sad one, the injuries and sufferings of the plaintiff being of a most distressing nature, but we cannot, without injustice to the company, and establishing an unwarranted and dangerous precedent, allow the verdict to stand on the evidence before us.

Counsel for respondent claims that the specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict are fatally defective, but in this we think he is in error. They fully present all the points upon which the defendant relied on its motion for a nonsuit and the motion for a new trial.

Judgment and order reversed.

FOERST v. MASONIC HALL ASS'N OF SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO. (No 14,184.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1893.)

Mortgages—Failure to Pay Interest—Election to Declare Principal Due—Excuse for Nonpayment.

1. A mortgage given to plaintiff by defendant association provided that there should be quarterly payments of interest, and that, on failure to so pay, the whole sum, at plaintiff's election, should become due. After the papers had passed, defendant's officers agreed that plaintiff could have the payments monthly, by calling for them, to which plaintiff assented, and for several months thereafter called and received her interest. Later, she failed to call, the interest was not paid, and plaintiff sought to have the whole debt declared due. Held that, after plaintiff's promise to call for the interest, defendant was excused from seeking her, to make payment, and, since the failure to pay was caused by her own act, she could not exact a penalty for such failure.

2. The fact that plaintiff called for the interest once, when defendant's president, who always paid her, was not in, does not aid her claim of forfeiture, when it does not appear that she demanded the interest from any one else, nor that, at the time she called, any interest was due.

3. A finding that plaintiff authorized an agent to collect the interest, and that he demanded it from defendant's president, who refused to pay unless he brought a written order from plaintiff, is contrary to the evidence, when the only testimony on the subject is that of the agent, who stated that he called on defendant's president, and asked him about the interest, and the president said that the money was ready for plaintiff, but that he would like to have an order before paying it, to which request the agent made no objection.

4. A finding that plaintiff's attorney, both before and after October 1st, which was more than three months after the last payment, demanded payment of the interest, and that such payment was refused unless he had written authority, if true, would not be conclusive of a default; for the question would still be open as to whether defendant had reasonable ground to doubt the attorney's authority.

5. Where plaintiff knew that defendant's agents were looking for her, to pay the interest, but she did not inform them where she was, or that she had authorized an agent to receive the money, failure of defendant to pay the interest within the prescribed time does not constitute a default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by Minna Foerst against the Masonic Hall Association of South San Francisco to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. & Geo. Leviston, for appellant.
F. J. Castelhun, for respondent.

Temple, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage, in which the plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

A preliminary objection is made to the statement, on the ground that it was not served in time. The judge made an order extending the time 30 days, in which "to serve notice of intention to move for a new trial, and the proposed bill of exceptions." Within that time the notice of intention was duly served and filed, and within 10 days thereafter another order was made, extending the time to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions and statement of the case 30 days, in addition to the time allowed by law. The statement was prepared and served within the period of the extension, and was therefore in time.

Among other necessary allegations the complaint contains the averment, that on the 28th day of November, 1888, defendant executed to plaintiff its note for $7,000, payable 4 years from date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per year, payable quarterly, which note further provided "that if default is made in the payment of the interest, as it becomes due, the same shall be added to, and become and form a part of, the principal, and bear a like rate of interest, or that the whole amount, of both principal and interest, shall become due and immediately payable upon such default, at the option of the payee." A proviso to the same effect was also inserted in the mortgage. It is also alleged "that on the 28th day of August, 1889, there became due and payable to plaintiff, as interest on said note for the two months immediately preceding said date, the sum of $81.66; that said sum was not paid until on or about the 5th day of October, 1889, on which day said defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $122.50, as interest on said note, for the three months ending September 28, 1889; that immediately before and after said payment was made, the plaintiff notified said defendant that she elected to consider the whole amount of the principal and interest due on said note as immediately due and payable," etc. Defendant answered, denying that either before or after September 28, 1889, or at any time, plaintiff notified defendant that she elected to consider the whole amount of principal and interest of said note as immediately due and payable, and defendant avers that shortly after the execution of said note and mortage plaintiff requested that the interest be paid monthly instead of quarterly; that the defendant consented to pay the interest monthly, instead of quarterly, if plaintiff would call for the interest monthly at the office of Dr. Todd, the president of defendant, in the afternoon of the 10th of each month; that plaintiff agreed to this, and did call and receive and collect her interest monthly, in pursuance of the agreement, for several months, but thereafter failed to call for the interest, and concealed herself from the defendant, its officers, and agents, with intent to evade the payment to her of said interest; that the defendant, and its officers and agents, ever since the failure of plaintiff as averred, made diligent search and inquiry as to her whereabouts, in order to tender to her the interest, but have not been able to find her, by reason of her concealing herself, and finally, on October 5, 1889, learning that Castelhun would receive payment for her, promptly paid the amount to him for her; that this was the first opportunity defendant had to pay said interest; that defendant was at all times ready and willing to pay the interest according to the terms of the note. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and findings were filed, to which exceptions are taken on the ground that they are contrary to and not supported by the evidence.

The first finding is almost in the language above quoted from the complaint, to the effect that plaintiff notified defendant, before and at the time of the payment of interest on October 4, 1889, that she elected to consider the whole amount of principal and interest due. Under the view I take in this case, I doubt if this finding is material, but I find no evidence whatever which proves, or tends to prove, that before the payment a syllable was ever uttered in regard to such election. Plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Castelhun, was the only witness for plaintiff in regard to this matter. He shows considerable correspondence in regard to some alleged defects in the title to the mortgaged property prior to October 4th, but not a word in regard to any such option. In regard to the payment on the 4th, he said: "Mr. Shaw gave me that check for the interest, and I gave him the following receipt, [here follows a receipt for the money,] without waiving any rights, and exercising the option of considering the whole amount of said note now due." He then says: "I informed Mr. Shaw, right then and there, that we elected to consider the whole amount of the note and mortgage due." This is all there is in regard to the matter, and it does not appear that a word was said in regard to the option to consider the whole amount due until Castelhun had the check in his hand.

The second finding is to the effect that defendant never authorized any one to agree that the interest should be paid monthly at the office of Dr. Todd. The point of this finding is said to be that the board of directors of defendant did not authorize or ratify the agreement. There is no conflict in the evidence showing that plaintiff did agree with the officers of defendant that she would call monthly upon Dr. Todd, and collect the interest. Dr. Todd, the president of defendant, testified that plaintiff called upon him, and complained that the interest was payable quarterly, when she understood it would be paid monthly, and said she must have it monthly. He told her to see Dunshee, the secretary, and he thought they could arrange the matter if she would call about the 10th, in the afternoon. She saw Dunshee about it. She did call monthly, and collect her interest until July, when she received two months' interest. Dunshee testified that he conversed with her about the matter, and finally told her that they would pay her if she would call after the first week at Dr. Todd's for it. "She said she would, and she was very glad to have it that way." This testimony is not controverted, but it is shown that there was no action on the subject by the directors. But, for the purposes of the defense, it was not necessary that there should have been a valid contract, changing the terms of the note. It was enough that she had promised to call in person for the interest, to excuse defendant from seeking her to make tender or payment. That they failed to do so was caused by her own act, and she cannot exact a penalty for the failure. If she desired to retract her promise, and stand upon her rights under the mortgage, good faith required that she should have first notified the agents of the defendant that she would call no more.

The third and fourth findings relate to the same subject, and are sufficiently discussed.

The sixth finding is to the effect that plaintiff called at the office of Dr. Todd in the latter part of the month of August, once for her interest, but no interest was paid to her. Perhaps this is verbally true, but, as applying to any issue in the case, it is misleading, and unsupported by the evidence. Plaintiff testified that she called twice, but Dr. Todd was not in, and it does not appear that she demanded her interest from any one. At that time the officers of defendant had no cause to suppose that she did not intend to keep her promise to call personally for her interest. Furthermore, it does not appear that when she called any interest was due her. It fell due on the 28th, and the latter part of August would include time prior to that date.

The seventh finding is to the effect that plaintiff, in September, authorized one Rosekamp to collect the interest, and that the agent demanded it from Dr. Todd, who refused to pay unless he brought a written order from plaintiff. This finding is not only unsupported by the evidence, but is contrary to all the testimony upon the subject. Rosekamp is the only witness who gave testimony relating to the matter. He said, after showing his authority: "I went there, and asked the doctor about it, and he said he would like to get an order from Mrs. Foerst to pay that. That was all the conversation I had about the matter. I told him that I was authorized by Mrs. Foerst to collect the interest. I had known Dr. Todd 15 years, and he knew my official position. Cross-examination: Dr. Todd said that the money was ready for Mrs. Foerst, but that he would like to have an order before paying it." This testimony, so far from showing that Dr. Todd declined to pay the interest, shows his entire readiness so to do. He expressed a desire for a written order, and plaintiff's agent made no objection to this reasonable request, but, on the contrary, seemed to acquiesce in it. Dr. Todd had no reason to suppose that his request was or could be construed into a refusal to pay. The request was a reasonable one, and should have been complied with. The fact that oral authority is sufficient to authorize the agent to collect does not affect the question. Rosekamp was a public officer, and was not an employe of plaintiff. Defendant had a right to have the payment indorsed upon the note, or a receipt from plaintiff for the money. He had a right to reasonable evidence of the agency. Rosekamp did not have the note with him. Under such circumstances, fair dealing required, at the very least, that defendant's agent should have been made to understand that a failure to pay without a written order would be taken as a refusal to pay. The agent of plaintiff not only did not make an absolute demand for payment without the order, but apparently acquiesced in the request.

Finding 8 is to the effect that plaintiff's attorney, Castlehun, both before and after October 1st, demanded payment of the interest, and that such payment was refused unless he had written authority. If true, this finding would not be conclusive of a default. The question would still be open as to whether defendant had reasonable ground to doubt Castlehun's authority. One must be satisfied with reasonable evidence of the authority of an agent, when required to pay money, or refuse to do so at his peril. But such reasonable evidence he is entitled to demand. But the evidence does not support the finding that such demand was made before October 1st, or that payment was ever declined unless written authority was produced. Some evidence there is that Castlehun told Leviston, defendant's attorney, about October 1st, that Castlehun was authorized to receive the money. Leviston was then, so far as appears, only employed in reference to alleged defects in the title of defendant to the mortgaged premises, and it does not appear that this statement was ever communicated to defendant's agents. Such a demand was made by Castlehun on defendant, October 1st, and apparently at the first interview thereafter between Shaw and Castlehun the interest was paid, to wit, October 4th.

The tenth finding is to the effect that plaintiff did not conceal herself with intent to evade the payment of interest to her. In this finding the court probably intended only to say that the concealment was not with the intent to evade the payment of the interest; but even in this it is against the evidence, and on this point there is no conflict. It must be remembered that parties occupying this continued relation owe each other, all the way through, fair and honest dealing. It was the duty of plaintiff to inform defendant of her address, or her agent's; and if she did not do so, and defendant made reasonable effort to find her, and failed, there was no default. On this subject plaintiff testified: "I know that the defendant's agents were looking for me. Question. Well, didn't you conceal yourself from them? Answer. Nonsense! What did I want to do that for? Q. Could they have found you? A. Well, indeed, I did not want them to find me, for I did not want to deal with them any more. I had two men employed to attend to my matters. The Court: Q. Did you tell them that these gentlemen would collect the interest for you? A. Tell who, sir? Q. The association, or the officers of the association? A. No, I did not tell the officers. You know I told Dr. Todd when I collected the interest the last time. I said, 'I don't know who collects the interest next month,' for I intended then to go back east or to Germany. He said, 'It makes no difference;' and then I sent Mr. Rosekamp. Q. Well, did you tell him that you would send Mr. Rosekamp? A. No, sir; but they knew Mr. Rosekamp for ten or twelve years, if not longer. He is an officer out there. He is sergeant of the police. Q. Did you ever notify them you had two men employed to attend to your matter? A. They knew, three weeks before I authorized Mr. Castlehun to collect the interest, that I had employed some one, for they gave Mr. Castlehun the deed of the lot which was mortgaged to me. So they must have known that he was employed in the matter. I didn't tell any of the officers of the association that these two gentlemen were authorized to collect interest for me. I didn't tell them that I would send Mr. Rosekamp. I knew that the officers of the association were looking for me after the interest became due, but I didn't want to see them. I did not want to deal with them any more after the president of the German bank told me that the mortgage was not a perfection, and that it was very hard for me, a lone-standing woman, to look after the matter." It is difficult to doubt the motives of plaintiff, after reading her testimony. What knowledge the officers of the association had of the authority of her agents has been sufficiently considered.

The eleventh finding is to the effect that defendant did endeavor to find plaintiff, but failed, and its officers were informed that she did not wish to meet them, but that her attorney had full power to transact her business. The last clause of the finding is entirely unsupported by the evidence, so far as it is applicable to the condition of things prior to October 1st.

The twelfth and thirteenth findings are unsupported by a scintilla of evidence, but, on the contrary, are against the evidence, which is without conflict.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had. The other points, under the circumstances, are not mentioned.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

McFARLAND and HARRISON, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. I think the evidence sufficient to support finding No. 1; but, in respect to other questions discussed, I concur in the foregoing opinion.

HARDY v. HARDY. (No. 14,259.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1893.)

PERMANENT ALIMONY—DESERTION—RES JUDICATA.

1. In an action for permanent alimony on the ground of desertion under Civil Code, § 137, it appeared that plaintiff met defendant in 1887, and demanded support as his wife. Defendant made no reply. Twenty-seven years before this, plaintiff had abandoned her home, and for more than 20 years, and until his death, had lived in adultery with one W., whose name she assumed, and to whom she bore children. Held, that she had forfeited all right to be received by defendant as his wife.

2. The fact that at the time plaintiff began to live with W. she had been informed by him and believed that defendant had procured a divorce from her, did not exonerate her; neither did information given her to the same effect by another within three months after she left defendant.

3. Plaintiff, in February, 1888, commenced an action against defendant for permanent support and maintenance, setting forth as her cause of action the same facts as in the present action. Defendant demurred to that complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was sustained. Held, that that judgment is a bar to this action, and plaintiff cannot maintain that the cause of action set forth in the present complaint is different from that in the former action for the reason that at that time the desertion claimed to have taken place in December, 1887, had not become a ground of divorce, because it had not been continued a year.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Action by Emma S. Hardy against Hiram P. Hardy to recover permanent alimony on the ground of desertion. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Eli R. Chase and John L. Chase, for appellant. Edward C. Robinson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action under the provisions of section 137, Civil Code, to recover permanent alimony from the defendant without seeking a divorce. The complaint is framed with two counts, but, as a demurrer to the first count was sustained, and the cause was tried upon the issues presented by the answer to the second count, only the matters therein alleged can be considered. The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, awarding her $20 a month, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The court finds that the defendant deserted the plaintiff on the 19th of December, 1887, and also that she had not deserted him, but that by reason of his cruelty towards her she was compelled to leave his house, and live separate from him. These findings are challenged in the statement as unsupported by the evidence, and it is also contended on the part of the appellant that the evidence shows that the plaintiff deserted the defendant in 1860.

The plaintiff and defendant were married in 1853, and lived together as husband and wife in the vicinity of Martinez for nearly seven years. In February, 1860, the plaintiff left the defendant, and went to live at the house of a friend near Pacheco. After remaining there a short time, she went to live at the house of another friend, a few miles out of Pacheco, where she met a man by the name of Wagner, whom she had previously known, and who appears to have aided her with his money and friendship. About a year after she left the defendant she was married to Wagner in San Francisco by a civil contract between them, and immediately went with him to Humboldt county, in this state, where they lived together as husband and wife, and continued to live in that vicinity, and in Oregon, until his death in 1883. During this period she bore five children to Wagner, and assumed his name, and was known as Mrs. Wagner, not only where they lived, but also in her former place of residence in Contra Costa county, and in other parts of California, and corresponded with her friends under that name. The defendant continued to reside in the vicinity of Martinez, and at some time in the year 1887 the plaintiff returned to that place, and on the 19th of December of that year, in the presence of a Mrs. Lander, with whom she was stopping, and whom she had asked to accompany her as a witness, saw the defendant at the county treasurer's office in the courthouse in Martinez, and said to him: "Mr. Hardy, I demand that you receive and support me as your wife." The defendant made no reply, but turned and went away, and thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action.

1. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides: "When the husband deserts the wife, she may, without applying for a divorce, maintain in the superior court an action against him for permanent support and maintenance for herself, or for herself and children." Although in some of the states the right of the wife to maintain an action for permanent maintenance, independent of any suit for a divorce, is recognized whenever she is living separate and apart from her husband without any fault on her part, yet in this state the legislature has limited the right of maintaining such action to the single case of desertion on the part of the husband, and has not authorized it to be maintained upon the ground of neglect, intemperance, cruelty, or any other act on his part which might be a sufficient ground for a divorce. Proof of willful desertion by the husband is, therefore, an essential element in the plaintiff's cause of action. The wife cannot abandon the dwelling place which he may have provided for her, if it be a reasonable place, and then seek support at his expense by virtue of this statute; nor is she entitled to maintain the action for his mere neglect to provide her with suitable support. Hence if, at the time she institutes the action, she is living separate and apart from him, it is essential for her to show that it is by reason of his desertion, or that by reason of his cruelty, or threats of bodily harm, she was forced to leave the family dwelling place. It is, moreover, just as essential that the wife who is seeking this relief should be without fault on her own part, in order that she may compel her husband to give her the support which this section provides. The foundation of her right to maintain the action is the obligation of the husband to support her, and whenever the husband has become freed from such obligation this action cannot be maintained against him. The same grounds which would justify him in leaving her, and living separate from her, or which would be a sufficient defense to any action by her for a divorce from him, will be a defense to this action. She must have the right to be received and treated by him as his wife in order to enable her to maintain the action, and if, in case of his desertion of her, her conduct after such desertion has been such as to forfeit her right to be received as his wife, he cannot be made liable under this section.

The finding of the court that the defendant deserted the plaintiff on the 19th day of December, 1887, and that he still willfully deserts her and keeps away from her, is unsupported by the evidence. The only evidence of any desertion by the defendant at that time was his refusal to comply with the aforesaid demand of the plaintiff. Literally construed, this refusal would be evidence merely of a neglect or failure on his part to give her support; but even if it could be considered, under proper circumstances, as tending to prove desertion by him, it would not, under the circumstances of this case, have any such effect. When the plaintiff had shown by her own testimony that she had left the defendant by abandoning their dwelling place more than 27 years prior to this demand, and had never thereafter returned, she could not rely upon this refusal as desertion, unless she should show that her leaving their dwelling place had been caused by his cruelty or threats, and the record shows no evidence of any such cruelty or threats.

The failure of the defendant to comply with the demand of the plaintiff in December, 1887, did not constitute desertion. The plaintiff and defendant had not been living together for more than 27 years. She had commenced to live in adultery with Wagner about a year after she left the defendant, and, having continued that life for more than 20 years, and until the death of Wagner, she had forfeited all right to be recognized or received by the defendant as his wife; and, even if it had been fully shown that he had originally deserted her, she would not, under these circumstances, have been entitled to receive any support from him. Even at the time of her demand she did not go to his house, and ask to be reinstated therein as his wife and the mistress of his household, but met him at the courthouse; and, as was said in the case of Jenkins v. Jenkins, 104 Ill. 136: "The circumstances of her visit excites strongly the suspicion that what she sought was not a home in the house of her husband, where she might live as a dutiful wife, but rather evidence of a refusal on his part of shelter, so that she might institute a suit for separate maintenance." The fact that at the time she began to live with Wagner she had been informed by him and believed that the defendant had procured a divorce from her, does not exonerate her from the consequences of her act. If she consented to rely upon such statement without any further verification, she assumed the risk of her conduct being unlawful in case it proved otherwise. The information to the same effect, claimed by her to have been given by Shock in March or April, 1860, could not have given her a bona fide belief that the defendant had procured a divorce from her, since that information was given to her within three months after she left the defendant, and it was within her personal knowledge that no summons in any such action had been served upon her. Neither can the letter from the defendant to her daughter, in 1862, be of any avail to her, inasmuch as this letter was not written until nearly a year after she had commenced to live with Wagner.

2. The plaintiff, in February, 1888, commenced an action against the defendant for permanent support and maintenance, setting forth as her cause of action in her complaint therein the same facts as are set forth in the complaint herein. To this complaint the defendant demurred upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, upon the demurrer being sustained, judgment was entered against the plaintiff. The defendant's plea herein that this judgment is a bar to the present action should have been sustained. The contention of the plaintiff that the cause of action set forth in the present complaint is different from that in the former action, for the reason that at that time the desertion claimed to have taken place on the 19th of December, 1887, had not become a ground for a divorce because it had not been continued for a year, cannot be maintained. The desertion by the husband which will authorize the wife to maintain an action for permanent support must be of the same character as would authorize her to maintain an action for a divorce; but, while the statute prescribes that her application for a divorce must be denied unless the desertion has continued for a year, it has not placed any such limitation upon her right to maintain this action. See Hulett v. Hulett, 80 Ky. 364. The right to maintain this action is independent of the right to maintain an action for divorce, and, being based upon the obligation of the husband to support the wife, may be instituted at any time after his desertion of her when he fails to give such support. In view, however, of the good order of society, and to preserve the stability of the marriage relation as much as possible, the legislature has provided that a divorce shall not be granted, unless such desertion shall have continued for a year. The same evidence which the plaintiff would have introduced to establish the allegations of her complaint in the former action was essential to establish those of the present complaint. She does not allege or claim any other act of desertion on the part of the defendant than was claimed in her former complaint, and the judgment at that time that the facts alleged were insufficient to entitle her to the relief asked is a bar to her right to maintain the present action. Los Angeles v. Mellus, 58 Cal. 16; Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131. The lapse of time since the act of desertion has not given her any additional cause of action, or increased the effect of the desertion for the purpose of entitling her to maintain this action. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1893.)

Foreclosure of Street Assessment—Defenses—Review on Appeal.

1. In an action by the contractor to foreclose a street assessment for sewer building, the fact that the laborers worked 10 hours per day, where the contract provided that 8 hours should be a legal day's work for the employes, cannot be taken advantage of by defendants, it being no concern of theirs on what terms such laborers worked.

2. A finding on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by C. B. Williams against the Savings & Loan Society and others to foreclose a street assessment made for certain sewer work done by plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Wood, for appellants. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. Action to foreclose a street assessment made for sewer work done in the city and county of San Francisco under the street law of 1885. The appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying a new trial. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and the judgment is supported by its allegations. The contract provided that eight hours should constitute a legal day's work for all persons employed. The contractor testified that the laborers worked ten hours for a day's work. The court found that the contractor performed all the conditions of the contract. It is now insisted that a new trial should be ordered, because the finding is contrary to the evidence. There is no merit in the appellants' position. If the finding had been in line with the evidence, the judgment would still have been the same. It is not a matter of the slightest concern to appellants as to the terms upon which the employes labored. U. S. v. Martin, 94 U. S. 403.

One of the defenses to the action is that the work for which the assessment was issued had not been performed according to the terms of the contract. The contract provided that, when the manhole was completed, "the top of the copings must be upon the official grade of the street," and the defendants averred in their answer that "the curb and top of the manhole were more than 11 inches above the official grade." In support of this averment, they read in evidence the certificate of the city surveyor, given May 16, 1888, from which it appeared that at that date the curb of the manhold was 11¼ inches above grade, but the assessment which was issued July 3, 1888, was some evidence that at that date the work had been performed according to the terms of the contract; and upon this conflict of evidence the finding of the court, that the averment in the answer is untrue, cannot be disturbed. The contractor may have caused the manhole to conform to the official grade before the assessment was issued.

This work was done at the crossing of Pacific avenue and Pierce street, and it is contended that the finding that this crossing was an open, public street is not supported by the evidence. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco attempted by resolution to establish Pacific avenue; said avenue being formed from a portion of Pacific street, a public street of said city and county. It is now claimed that said resolution is void by reason of uncertainty in the location of the boundaries of the proposed avenue. It is conceded by counsel that the resolution of the board does indicate that Pacific avenue was to be formed from some portion, at least, of Pacific street; and it was held in Brady v. Page, 59 Cal. 52, that courts take judicial notice of the streets of San Francisco, of their relation to each other, and their location. By reason of this fact, we know that Pierce street could only intersect Pacific street at one point, and that point of intersection would necessarily form the crossing where the improvement here involved is located, and that crossing would necessarily form a part of the public street.

We find nothing further in the record, demanding our attention. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur. Paterson, J.; Harrison, J.

SCHWARZE v. MAHONEY. (No. 14,607.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1893.)

Landlord and Tenant—Appeal.

1. An objection to a person's capacity to sue for and recover rent, on the ground that she is a married woman, cannot be raised on appeal, where it was not raised either by answer or demurrer on the trial.

2. In an action by a married woman for rent, it appeared that certain premises were leased to her in her own name, and that she sublet part thereof to defendant, and that he took possession. Defendant testified that, when he asked plaintiff what rent she would charge for the premises, she replied, "15 a month," and that he told her he would take it, but that he never promised to pay any rent. Held, that his acts were sufficient to lead plaintiff to believe that he would occupy the premises as her tenant, and pay rent, and that he could not afterwards deny that relation.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action of unlawful detainer by Schwarze against Mahoney. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

D. I. Mahoney, for appellant. Geo. D. Shadburne, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $540 and costs of the action. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied; and thereupon he appealed to this court from the judgment and from the order.

The principal point made on this appeal is that the respondent, being a married woman, cannot recover; that the rents, if any due, are community property, for which the husband alone can sue. This objection to the plaintiff's right to maintain the action cannot be considered, because there is no demurrer, and there is nothing in the answer indicating an intention on the part of the defendant to raise the question of the plaintiff's capacity to sue. The defendant states in his answer that plaintiff is a married woman, wife of one F. J. Schwarze; that said Schwarze is a tenant of the upper portion of the premises known as "1901 Polk Street,"—a portion of the same premises wherein the premises described in the complaint are situated,—but denies that this plaintiff ever was in the occupation of the premises described in the complaint, or that she ever had any title or interest therein. This is clearly insufficient as a plea in abatement, or of want of capacity to sue. The right of a married woman to enter into any transaction with any other person which she might if unmarried (Civil Code, § 158) gives to her a correlative right to enforce, to the same extent that she could if unmarried, any obligation which she may have received from such other person as the consideration for such transaction; and whenever, in a transaction with a married woman, another person has received from her any property or advantage for which he has given his obligation, the burden is upon him to show that the transaction was entered into by her as the agent of the community, and not for herself, if he would resist his obligation upon the ground of her marriage. Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 287, 28 Pac. Rep. 1045. In the case at bar the record shows that the premises described in the complaint, together with the upper story of the building in which they were situated, were leased to the plaintiff by a duly-authorized agent, and that, while she was in the actual, exclusive, and lawful possession thereof, she leased the lower portion of the house to the defendant at a rental of $15 per month. The defendant attempted to show that he entered into possession of the premises by virtue of his own right therein, but in this he failed. He stated in his testimony that he asked Mrs. Schwarze about the place, and what the rent would be; that she told him it would be $15 per month, and he replied that he would take it; that she told him he could take possession of the entire lower floor, as she had no use for the kitchen. He attempted to avoid the effect of this testimony by saying that he did not promise that he would pay the rent; that he "never promised to pay Mrs. Schwarze or anybody else the rent." Of course, the court below did not for a moment listen to such a subterfuge.

We find no error in the rulings of the court. The relation of landlord and tenant is clearly shown by the record, and the claim of title upon which the defendant predicates several of the contentions of error in the rulings of the court is not a proper subject of inquiry in the case. The plaintiff testified, and in this was corroborated by the agent, that she took a lease of the house in her own name and right; that her husband was not known in the transaction. It is clear that the defendant would not have been permitted to occupy the house if he had not led the plaintiff to believe that he would occupy it as her tenant, and pay her $15 per month rental. He cannot now, therefore, dispute the relationship.

Judgment and order affirmed.

McDONALD v. DODGE. (No. 14,476.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1893.)

PRESUMPTION ON APPEAL—PROTEST AGAINST PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT—APPROVAL OF MAYOR.

1. The street law of 1883, (section 3,) as amended by St. 1889, p. 158, provides that a protest against a proposed street improvement by a majority of the owners in frontage on such street shall bar further proceedings, except where, among other things, the proposed work is to be done in a block lying between blocks which have already been graded, when the work shall not be stayed, unless the city council deem proper. Held, on appeal from a judgment declaring valid an assessment for work protested against by the majority of the frontage owners, that the supreme court would assume that the block in question was between graded blocks, in the absence of any evidence in the record to the contrary.

2. Though the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco is vested with the veto power, he is not a part of the legislative department of the city government, within the meaning of the street law of 1883, (section 34,) which declares the city council to be such department; and hence, under the provision of such street law which requires a resolution of intention to make a public improvement to be approved by the mayor "or" a three-fourths vote of the council, a resolution passed by a three-fourths vote of the board of supervisors, which is the legislative department for the city, does not need the approval of the mayor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by J. M. McDonald against H. L. Dodge for a street assessment levied by the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a street assessment case arising in the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order denying a new trial. There are only two points made by appellant which need special notice.

1. Appellant's counsel contends that the record shows a written protest by a majority of the frontage of the property fronting on the proposed work involved in this action, (which fact may be taken, for the present, as true,) and that, therefore, the assessment sued on was void, because section 3 of the street law of 1883, as amended by the act of March 14, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 158,) provides that such a protest "shall be a bar for six months to any further proceeding." To this counsel for respondent replies that said section provides that the work "shall not be stayed by any written or other protest unless such council shall deem proper," and neither counsel makes the slightest reference to the possibility of reconciling those two apparently incongruous provisions. But upon an examination of the section, which is a very long one, we find its provisions to be that, with respect to certain kinds of work, and certain conditions of property, a protest, of itself, stops proceedings for six months; while with respect to other kinds of work, and other conditions of property, a protest has not such effect. And, among other things, it provides that a protest shall not stop proceedings in a case where the proposed work is to be done in a block lying between blocks which have been already graded. Now, whether or not such was the condition of the block upon which the work was done in the case at bar does not appear. No such issue was raised by the pleadings, and whether or not there was evidence upon the point we cannot tell. There is nothing upon the subject in the record. This being so, we will not presume, against the validity of the judgment, that the block in question was not between graded blocks. An appellant, to be successful, must show error.

2. Appellant contends for a reversal because the resolution of intention, and the resolutions ordering the work and approving the award, were not presented to or approved by the mayor. The act clearly provides that the city council shall pass the resolution of intention, and order the work; and with respect to the award the provision is that it "shall be approved by the mayor, or a three-fourths vote of the city council." By section 34 of the act it provides that "the term 'city council' is hereby declared to include a body or board which, under the law, is the legislative department of the government of any city." In San Francisco the board of supervisors is the "body or board" which forms the legislative department of the government of the city. It is true that the mayor, by virtue of his right of veto in certain cases, has some of the lawmaking power of the municipality; but the charter of the city does not make him a part of the "legislative department," in the sense that no independent power is, or can be, given to the latter. See Brooks v. Fischer, 79 Cal. 173, 21 Pac. Rep. 652. Throughout the street law, above referred to, there is a distinction between the city council and the mayor, independent duties and powers being assigned and given to each. In the case at bar, all the necessary proceedings, to and including the ordering of the work, were duly taken by the board of supervisors, and the award was approved by a three-fourths vote of said board. This was sufficient.

The other points made by appellant do not need discussion. It is sufficient to say that they are not tenable.

Judgment and order affirmed.

SOBERANES v. SOBERANES. (No. 15,021.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 7, 1893.)

EQUITY—RESCISSION—GIFT BY PARENT TO CHILD.

1. A gift by a mother, old and illiterate, of all of her property to one of her sons, to the exclusion of her other children, will not be set aside at the suit of the mother, on the ground that the gift strips her of all her property, and leaves her dependent on the charity of others, where it affirmatively appears that the gift was executed by the mother while in possession of all her faculties, with a full understanding of all the facts and the effect of the transfer, and in the execution of a purpose long entertained by her, originating in a desire to show her appreciation of the son's devotion and services, and that she was not the victim of his artifices and contrivances, nor of undue influence exerted by him.

2. The mere fact that the mother did not have independent advice is no ground for setting aside the gift, made freely, and with a full understanding of its effect; nor is the age of the mother, (65 years,) standing alone, a sufficient ground.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Soberanes against Abel Soberanes to set aside a transfer of land made by plaintiff to defendant. From a judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. M. Delmas, for appellant. Myrick & Deering and Alexander Daugherty, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought to set aside a transfer of certain real estate, valued at $100,000, alleged to have been procured by defendant from his mother through the exercise of undue influence and artful schemes. The case is before us on the judgment roll alone. The court found the facts to be as follows: The plaintiff—now an incompetent person, represented by her guardian—is about 65 years of age, uneducated and illiterate.

She has never been competent to attend to, understand, or transact the ordinary business of life, except such as relates to household duties, but in the latter respect has always been the head of the family, and discharged the duties of her position as a wife and mother with full competency, wisdom, and prudence. Plaintiff at the time of the transfer was in possession of all her natural mental faculties. Francisco Soberanes, plaintiff's husband, died in 1887, leaving real and personal estate of the value of $200,000. During the latter years of his life he was mentally infirm, and surrendered the management of his business affairs to his son, the defendant, who acted as his agent and attorney in fact. The latter's administration of the father's business was not satisfactory to the other children, and this led to an estrangement between him and them, but not of a serious or lasting character. These dissensions did not extend, however, to the father and mother, nor were all the children involved therein. Soon after the father's death, disputes as to who should administer upon his estate and manage its affairs arose among the children. A family council was held, which resulted in more bitterness and distrust, and the administration of the estate was intrusted to a stranger. The estate was finally distributed to the heirs,—one half to the surviving widow, and the balance to the children, six in number, in equal shares. After the distribution of the estate, as stated, only the defendant continued to reside with his mother on that part of the rancho which had been set apart to her. At all times since the death of Francisco the defendant has been, and is now, his mother's sole agent and confidential adviser, and has had, and now has, full and absolute control over her business; but the defendant has never had control of her person, except such control as a dutiful and affectionate son should properly exercise over the person of an aged and affectionate mother. Since the distribution of the estate, personal hostility between the defendant on one side, and some brothers and sisters on the other, has been increased by business and personal difficulties. The plaintiff identified herself with Abel's business interests, but as far as possible refrained from any personal antagonism with the other children. Her motherly affection was deep and broad enough to cover them all, and she bewailed the unhappy conditions, and frequently besought them to end their quarrels; but the breach widened, and in the end the mother was estranged from all her children except the defendant, Abel, and a married daughter. While the disputes were pending and progressing, plaintiff frequently declared that she would give her property only to such of her children as would respect and adhere to her. During the time stated, defendant acquired, and now retains, plaintiff's complete confidence, and by reason thereof she gave to him absolute control of all her property, and everything pertaining thereto. This was not brought about, however, by any skillful contrivance, false representation, or concealment, nor has the defendant dominated the will or directed the judgment of plaintiff in any transaction, or in any manner exercised undue influence over her. Ever since his father's death the defendant has taken great interest in his mother's personal welfare. This interest was not unusual or pretended, but natural. On May 24, 1890, the plaintiff conveyed to defendant the lands described in the complaint. This conveyance was intended as a gift, and as a matter of fact the consideration named in the deed, viz. $500, was never paid, nor intended to be paid, to the plaintiff. The land was worth $100,000. At the same time she gave to the defendant and his married sister above referred to 500 head of cattle, valued at $8,000. At the time the deed was executed there were present, besides the plaintiff, an attorney, who drew the deed, the notary, and Dr. Gordan, a physician. The attendance of these persons was procured by the defendant to serve as witnesses to the execution of the deed, and as to the competency of plaintiff to execute it. The plaintiff did not have the advice of any person about the transaction, nor did she wish to have any advice, the deed having been executed and delivered by her freely and voluntarily. She was at that time able to comprehend and understand the nature, character, and effect of the transaction, and made the deed freely and intelligently, and fully comprehended the effect of the same. Plaintiff was at that time, however, by reason of illiteracy and want of experience and knowledge of business affairs, unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of her property, and by reason thereof was liable to be deceived and imposed upon by designing persons in the transaction of business. Said real and personal property was all the property owned or possessed by the plaintiff. The court found, as conclusion of law, that plaintiff was not entitled to the relief claimed, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff, by her guardian, has appealed.

The facts found, as stated above, do not warrant the court in ascribing the deed in question to undue influence. It is apparent, if the facts stated be true, and they must be so regarded, that the plaintiff was not the dupe of the defendant's artifices, the victim of his contrivances, or in any way subjected to his sway. The defendant's position was one of high trust and confidence, and binding him, both by honor and in law, not only to abstain from anything like craft or guile, but to be generous and fair, and his conduct should be examined with the greatest scrutiny; but there is no rule which creates a disability to take a bounty under the circumstances narrated. Transactions of the kind in question should be thoroughly sifted, but a voluntary deed, free from any imputation of undue influence, executed by a mother with her eyes open, cannot be set aside merely upon the ground that an honorable man would not accept a gift which strips his mother of all her property, and leaves her dependent upon the charity of others. A person in possession of all his faculties has a right to dispose of his property as he sees fit, upon the principle stated by Lord Nottingham,—that, if he will improvidently bind himself up by a voluntary deed, he need not expect the court to break the fetters put upon himself by his own folly. To hold that gifts voluntarily made, and with full knowledge of all the facts, and of the nature and effect of the transfer, should be set aside because the donor had divested himself of his property, would be to establish a rule that no man can make a voluntary disposition of his estate except by will. Ralston v. Turpin, 129 U. S. 675, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; Saufley v. Jackson, 16 Tex. 581. There is no doubt as to the principle applicable to cases of this kind. Transactions like the one under consideration are watched by courts of equity with the most scrutinizing jealousy, and are generally held to be presumptively void. They will be set aside upon the discovery of the least fraud, and every presumption ought to be indulged against them. The person who makes the donation and bestows the confidence is not bound to show that any imposition has been practiced upon him. It is sufficient for him to establish intimate and confidential relations with the donee. Some of the cases hold that undue influence is not to be inferred from the relation of parent and child, where the gift is from the parent to the child, (Millican v. Millican, 24 Tex. 446;) but where the parent is of great age, or is enfeebled by disease, and conveys his entire estate to one child, to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, the burden is unquestionably upon the donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge of all the facts, and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer, (Todd v. Grove, 33 Md. 194; Highberger v. Stiffler, 21 Md. 352.)

At the argument some suggestions were made which, if true, lend a moral aspect to the case that strongly appeals to the sentiment of equity and justice; but they are not verified by the record, and, if they were, it would be sufficient to say that neither courts of equity nor of law have a right to enforce mere moral obligations. The findings of the court are conclusive. They show that the plaintiff's gift was made in the execution of a purpose long entertained by her, originating in a desire to show her appreciation of defendant's devotion and services, and they negative expressly and entirely all the material allegations of the complaint.

It is claimed by the appellant that the transfer should be set aside because the plaintiff did not have independent advice. No case has been cited which holds that it must be shown that the donor acted upon independent advice in transactions between parent and child, when it appears that the gift was made freely, voluntarily, and with full understanding of all the facts and the effect of the transfer. The rule in this regard is not the same as in the case of a gift from a client to his attorney. In Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506, and Richards v. Donner, 72 Cal. 207, 13 Pac. Rep. 584, cases upon which the appellant relies, it appeared that the grantor did not fully understand the nature and effect of the conveyance. All of the cases cited contain some ingredient showing undue influence sufficient to induce the conclusion that the act was not perfectly free and voluntary on the part of the donor.

We do not regard the age of the plaintiff as a controlling fact in the case. Some of the greatest men of modern times have displayed the highest abilities after passing the age of threescore and ten. Notable instances of this are found in the lives of Disraeli, Gladstone, Bismarck, and of Lord Mansfield, who left the bench at the age of 84. Chancellor Kent wrote his great commentaries after he had retired from the bench on account of having reached the period of life fixed by the constitution for judicial superannuation.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLARD v. TATUM et al. (No. 14,798.)

RESCISSION OF SALE—DELAY IN RETURNING GOODS.

1. A seller of stationary engines will not be relieved from his agreement to rescind the sale, and accept their return, by the mere fact that the purchaser returned one more engine than specified in the agreement, without, however, requiring its acceptance by the seller as a condition to the return of the others.

2. A delay of eight months in shipping the engines after it was agreed that they should be returned by the purchasers from San Francisco to the sellers at Chicago, by a shipment via Cape Horn, is not so unreasonable, as matter of law, as will relieve the seller from his obligation to accept them, where it appears that they had been paid for by the purchasers; that the seller had the use of the money during all this time; that no loss was suffered by the delay; that the refusal to accept them was based on a claim that a change in the pattern of the engines rendered those returned less valuable than formerly; that some of the returned engines were in a branch house of the purchasers at Portland, Or., and had to be brought to San Francisco for shipment; and that the engines were in fact shipped by the first vessel carrying a miscellaneous cargo.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by Charles P. Willard against H. L. Tatum and Joseph J. Bowen to recover for goods sold. Defendants interposed a counterclaim. From a judgment in defendants' favor, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Dickinson, for appellant. Langhorne & Miller, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff is engaged in the business of manufacturing engines and other machinery in Chicago, Ill., and the defendants are copartners doing business in San Francisco. Plaintiff brought this action to recover a balance upon book account, and also the amount of a promissory note, due him from defendants for goods sold. There was no contest as to these claims, but defendants, by way of counterclaim, alleged, in substance, that prior to 1887 they purchased from plaintiff several "Davey Safety Engines,"—one of four-horse power, for $430; four of two-horse power, for $255 each; and one of one-horse power, for $191.25,—and paid for said engines $1,551.25; that they proved unsalable, and on April 27, 1887, defendants wrote plaintiff that these engines were "dead stock;" that they had sold but two, leaving on hand one four-horse power, three two-horse power, and one one-horse power; that they had ordered these engines relying on plaintiff's representations, and that the engines had not come up to them; and asking for a proposition under which they might return them; that plaintiff thereupon agreed by letter that if defendants would have the engines boxed and returned to him, freight prepaid, he would credit defendants the full amount they had paid for them. Afterwards it was agreed they might be returned by vessel around Cape Horn and via New York. March 27, 1888, defendants shipped the engines, but included one more two-horse power engine than was named in the proposition. After they were shipped, and the vessel was at sea, and on receipt of the bill of lading, plaintiff wrote defendants, refusing to give credit for the engines, but offering to take care of them, and make the best disposition he could for defendants. This change of purpose was based on an alleged change in the patterns of the engines, made after the agreement to take them back, by which it was claimed the old style was not worth so much as before. The court found for defendants for the price of the motors (excluding the extra two-horse power engine not specified in the original proposition,) less the amount of plaintiff's claim specified in his complaint, and gave judgment for defendants for $871.87 and interest. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial

Appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings cannot be sustained.

1. That an extra engine was shipped is true. But defendants did not make the return and acceptance of the others conditional upon the acceptance of it by plaintiff, nor was he charged with it by the court. The cases cited by appellant do not sustain him. Stevenson v. Burgin, 49 Pa. St. 36, holds that a contract for a certain fixed quantity of merchandise, to be delivered on shipboard by the vendor, is not complied with by a tender of bills of lading for a larger quantity; and a demand of payment therefor at the price agreed on cannot be enforced by the vendor. Clark v. Baker, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 186, holds that it is the duty of the seller of a cargo of corn in bulk, part of which is damaged, to separate the good from the bad, and offer the good to the buyer. The corn was sold as of a certain quality, and the buyer could not be required to make the selection. In Brewer v. Railroad Co., 104 Mass. 593, the contract was for wood of a particular quality, and plaintiff delivered wood intermixed with that of an inferior quality. The court held that defendant would not be obliged to accept it. Croninger v. Crocker, 62 N. Y. 151, was a similar case, where wool of the quality contracted for was largely intermixed with inferior qualities. In the case at bar there was no difference in quality,—simply one engine more than was embraced in the agreement. No separation or examination was required, as they were entirely distinct, each complete in itself, and no requirement was made that plaintiff should accept it. We know of no case which goes so far as to relieve plaintiff from accepting the others for that reason.

2. It is specified by appellant that the evidence further shows that defendants never did comply with the agreement, viz. by "shipping and delivering the engines at Chicago." The court found that plaintiff received the engines, and that finding is not attacked. Besides, it may well be that defendants were relieved by the conduct of the plaintiff from a delivery at the place specified.

3. This specification is that the evidence shows there was no consideration for the agreement, and that nothing was done under it. Plaintiff answered defendants' cross complaint, and did not allege that the agreement was without consideration. But, assuming that a denial of the agreement raised that question, we think the facts showed a good and sufficient consideration.

4. The most important question presented by appellant is whether the engines were returned within a reasonable time after the agreement was made. About eight months elapsed after the mode of shipment was arranged before they were in fact shipped. "There is no precise standard of reasonable time. The true rule must be that that is a reasonable time which preserves to each party the rights and advantages he possessed, and protects each party from losses that he ought not to suffer." 2 Pars. Cont. p. 662. The question here involves the consideration of the relations and dealings of the parties, including the fact that defendants had, until after the time this agreement was made, the entire sale of plaintiff's manufactures on the Pacific coast, not on commission, but by purchase; that these engines had been paid for by defendants, and plaintiff still held and had the use of the money so paid; that no loss is shown to have accrued to the plaintiff by the delay; that plaintiff's objection to taking the engines under that agreement was not based on the fact of delay, but on the claim that after the agreement and before the shipment a change had been made in the pattern of the "Davey Safety Engine," which rendered the old make (these engines) less valuable; but on the trial this claim was abandoned. Some of these engines were in defendants' house at Portland, Or., and had to be brought to San Francisco; and defendants also gave evidence tending to show that they were shipped by the first vessel sailing to New York, carrying a miscellaneous cargo, of which they were informed. Evidence was given showing that other vessels, before the one by which the engines were shipped, cleared for New York, but it does not affirmatively appear that they carried miscellaneous cargoes. We think the question was one of fact, which would have been properly submitted to a jury under proper instructions from the court; that there is evidence sufficient to sustain the finding, and that it should not be set aside. See Luckhart v. Ogden, 30 Cal. 558-560.

No exceptions were reserved on the trial, and the errors of law specified are fully covered by the foregoing. The judgment is sustained by the findings, and therefore the court did not err in rendering judgment for defendants. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

TRADE-MARKS—PROTECTION—DECEIVING PUBLIC—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

1. The courts will not grant relief on a claim to the exclusive use of a trade-mark which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public, as to the manufacturer of an article, and the place where it is manufactured.

2. The credibility of witnesses is a question for the trial court, and its findings will not be disturbed, where there is evidence to support them.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by one Joseph against one Macowsky. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for appellant. Manual Eyre, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought to restrain the defendant from making or selling any razor having a stamp thereon, or upon the case thereof, showing the words, "Queen's Own," or the words, "Queen's Own Co." The plaintiff alleged that he had been for many years importing razors which he had caused to be manufactured in England; and in order that said razors might become known in the market, and easily identified, and their origin known, he had caused each one of them to be stamped upon the "tang" (which is the thick part of the razor blade, back of the cutting part) with the words, "Queen's Own Co." He alleged that, on account of said trade-mark, the razors had become known in the commercial world as the "Queen's Own" razors, and had acquired great reputation with the public for excellence of quality; that the defendant had unlawfully been selling razors which were marked in conspicuous letters, upon the blade thereof, "Queen's Own;" and that the imitations were calculated to deceive those desiring to purchase plaintiff's razors. The court found that all of the razors offered for sale by the plaintiff have stamped upon the shank on one side the words, "Queen's Own Co., Sheffield;" that, in point of fact, the razors are not manufactured by any company or firm known by the name or designation of "Queen's Own Co.," nor manufactured in Sheffield, Eng.; that the defendant has not sold any razor which, by a stamp or general appearance, was designed or calculated to mislead the public, as an imitation of the plaintiff's razors; that "there was a total dissimilarity between them, and apparent to any person upon even the slightest inspection."

The only question raised on this appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings of the court. We cannot say that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It is true the plaintiff, in his direct examination, testified that the razors were manufactured in Sheffield, but in his cross-examination he admitted that he did not buy them through a Sheffield house. He said he knew they were manufactured in Sheffield only because he purchased them from Harrison Bros. & Houston, all of whose goods were manufactured in Sheffield. He admitted that there was no company in England or in this country known as the "Queen's Own Co.," and that he alone constituted the "Queen's Own Co." T. S. Conran, a dealer in cutlery, testified on behalf of the defendant that plaintiff told him he purchased the razors from Harrison Bros. & Houston, but did not know who made them. He testified, also, that said firm did not manufacture razors. The credibility of these witnesses was a matter for the court below to consider and determine, and we have no right to interfere with its decision.

Assuming the facts found to be correct,—as we must,—the plaintiff is seeking to enjoin the defendant from using a trade-mark which he himself is not, in equity or good conscience, entitled to use, because it is a fraud upon the public. The evident purpose of the defendant's stamp upon the razor, and his advertisement and label, as the court below said, were "to cause the purchasing public to believe that these razors are manufactured by a firm known as "Queen's Own Co.," and in Sheffield, Eng., when, in point of fact, he did not know where they were manufactured, nor by whom. The positive assertion of a thing not known to be true is as reprehensible as the assertion of a thing which is known to be untrue. Assuming, therefore, that the defendant did make and sell razors precisely like those sold by the plaintiff, the latter cannot complain. The plaintiff's purpose in endeavoring to make the public believe that his razors were manufactured in Sheffield is manifest. He testified that: "English cutlery is better than German. * * * In no part of the world is the manufacture equal to the English; not even American goods." Cutlery manufactured in Sheffield has a wide reputation for excellence. A person who comes into a court of equity for an injunction, in a case of this kind, must come with clean hands. He cannot be granted relief upon a claim to the exclusive use of a trade-mark, which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public as to the manufacturer of the article, and the place where it is manufactured. Browne, Trade-Marks, §§ 71, 474; Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. St. 156; Fetridge v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. 385; Hobbs v. Francais, 19 How. Pr. 571; Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436. In Siegert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 284, the court said: "It is a general rule of law, in cases of this kind, that courts of equity will not interfere by injunction where there is any lack of truth in the plaintiff's case; that is, where there is any misrepresentation in his trade-mark or labels.

In view of what has been said, we deem it unnecessary to consider the question whether the defendant's razors were so formed or stamped as to lead the public to believe they were of the same kind as those sold by the plaintiff. We have preferred to rest our decision upon a ground which will tend to discourage the use of false and misleading trade-marks and labels. The judgment and order are affirmed.

BLYTHE v. AYRES et al. (No. 14,938.)

CONFLICT OF LAWS—LEGITIMATION OF BASTARD—EVIDENCE.

1. The status of a bastard, with reference to its legitimation by the acts of the father, are determinable by the laws of his domicile, and not by the laws of the domicile of the child and mother.

2. Civil Code, § 230, provides that "the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it." Held, that the word "adopts" is used in the sense of "legitimates" and the acts of the father, if they fill the requirements of the statute, result in the legitimation of the child.

3. Where a putative father was at all times domiciled in California, where he resided in a lodging house with his mistress, or alone in his cabin in the mountains, and was never married, had no family or relations except in a collateral line, whom he had not seen or communicated with since the birth of his child, more than 10 years prior to his death, who resided with her mother, in England, where the child was begotten and born, and where the mother subsequently married a resident husband, and was at all times domiciled, and the father on all occasions declared the child to be his, and acknowledged her paternity to the mother and grandmother before the child's birth, and had her christened and baptized by his name, and corresponded with her as his daughter, and furnished her only $150 a year, though he was a millionaire of plain and simple habits, and made a will providing for her, which was subsequently lost or destroyed, his acts constituted a full adoption and legitimation, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 230. McFarland, J., and De Haven, J., dissenting. In re Jessup, 21 Pac. Rep. 976, and 22 Pac. Rep. 742, 1028, 81 Cal. 419, followed.

4. Civil Code, § 1387, provides that "every illegitimate child is an heir of any person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child." Held, where a putative father wrote and signed letters in the presence of a competent witness to the child, addressing her as "My darling child," and signing himself, "From your loving father," and also wrote her grandfather with reference to having her baptized and christened with his name, and relative to her religious instructions, that such acts constituted a complete acknowledgment, within the meaning of the Code, and it was not necessary that the witness in whose presence the letters were signed should subscribe the same. Pina v. Peck, 31 Cal. 359, explained.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Action by Florence Blythe, a minor, by James Crisp Perry, the guardian of her person and estate, against Abbie Ayres and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. S. Brown, John R. Jarboe, W. S. Goodfellow, and Edward R. Taylor, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart, Garber, Boalt & Bishop, Thos. J. Bergin, and W. W. Foote, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action instituted under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the plaintiff, a minor, through her guardian, to determine the heirship and title to the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. The section provides that in all estates now being administered, or that may hereafter be administered, any person claiming to be heir to the deceased, or entitled to distribution, in whole or in any part, of such estate, may, at any time after the expiration of one year from the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration upon such estate, file a petition in the matter of such estate, praying the court to ascertain and declare the rights of all persons to said estate, and all interests therein, and to whom distribution thereof should be made. The case is most important from any view. The defendants, claiming to be collateral kindred, are numbered by the hundred, many of them represented by separate counsel of great ability and experience in the law; the property interests involved are very large; the trial in the nisi prius court extended continuously through the greater portion of a year; the facts are novel, and the principles of law applicable many and complicated.

Plaintiff's claim is based upon sections 230 and 1387, respectively, of the Civil Code of California. Section 230 reads as follows: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such, and such child is thereupon, for all purposes, legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption." Section 1387, as far as it pertains to the matters involved in this litigation, provides: "Every illegitimate child is an heir of any person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child."

As a result of the trial the court filed findings of fact, and its conclusions of law based thereon are to the effect that the plaintiff, Florence Blythe, was and is the child of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased; that said Thomas H. Blythe legally adopted her under the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code; that she is his lawful heir, and the only person entitled to have and receive distribution of the estate of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. The principles of law and the facts of the case bearing upon her contention under these respective provisions of the Code are entirely dissimilar, involving a separate discussion; and in the construction of section 230 our investigation also necessarily divides itself into two distinct branches: (1) Was plaintiff so domiciled, with relation to her putative father's domicile, as to have rendered any action of his looking to adoption available for that purpose? Or, placing the interrogatory in the clear and emphatic language of appellants' counsel, (to which interrogatory they all with great confidence give answer, "Yes,") was she so domiciled, or so situated, that she could not be subject to the laws of California, and be by those laws transmuted from bastardy to legitimacy? (2) If her situation endowed her with the capacity for legitimation, did the acts of Blythe bring her within the requirements of the statute?

The facts found by the court which face us while we are engaged in a consideration of the first branch of this subject may be succinctly and substantially stated as follows: (1) That plaintiff was born in England, upon December 18, 1873, and was the issue of Thomas H. Blythe and Julia Perry; (2) that Julia Perry was a native of England, domiciled therein, and continued to there reside until one month after the death of said Blythe; (3) that plaintiff remained in England until after the death of Blythe, when she came to California, and said Blythe was never at any time within any of the countries of Europe after the 29th day of August, 1873; (4) that said Blythe was a citizen of the United States and of the state of California, domiciled in said state, and died intestate therein April 4, 1883, leaving surviving him no wife, no father, no mother, and no child, save and except said Florence Blythe, the plaintiff herein; (5) that said Thomas H. Blythe and said Julia Perry never were married, and said plaintiff was begotten while said Blythe was temporarily sojourning in England, and was born after said Blythe's return to California, and that said Blythe never was married.

Before passing to the merits of the discussion, we pause a moment to say that the verb "adopts," as used in section 230, is used in the sense of "legitimates," and that the acts of the father of an illegitimate child, if filling the measure required by that statute, would result, strictly speaking, in the legitimation of such child, rather than in its adoption. Adoption, properly considered, refers to persons who are strangers in blood; legitimation, to persons where the blood relation exists. See law dictionaries,—Bouvier, Black, Anderson, and Rapalje. This is the distinguishing feature between adoption and legitimation, as recognized by all the standard law writers of the day who have written upon the subject; and, for the reason that the text writers and the decisions of courts to which we shall look for light and counsel treat the subject as a question of legitimation, we shall view the matter from that standpoint. The section is broad in its terms. It contains no limitations or conditions, and, to the extent of the power vested in the legislature of the state, applies to all illegitimates, wherever located, and wherever born. The legislature has not seen fit to make any exception to its operation, and, as was said by Chief Justice TANEY in Brewer v. Blougher, 14 Pet. 178, when considering a quite similar provision of a statute: "In the case before us the words are general, and include all persons who come within the description of illegitimate children; and when the legislature speaks in general terms of children of that description, without making any exceptions, we are bound to suppose they design to include the whole class." Bar, in his work on International Law, (page 434,) says: "Legitimation of bastards, either by subsequent marriage or by an act of the government, (rescriptum principiis,) is nothing but a legal equalization of certain children illegitimately begotten with legitimate children." In other words, the object and effect of section 230 is to change the status and capacity of an illegitimate child to the status and capacity of a child born in lawful wedlock.

This case, upon its facts, presumably stands alone in legal jurisprudence, for counsel in the exercise of great learning and unexampled industry have failed to parallel it. We have here a father at all times domiciled in the state of California, a mother at all times domiciled in England, and an illegitimate child born in England, and continuously there residing until the death of her father in California. As to the effect of our statutes upon such a state of facts, the consideration of the matter of domicile of these parties, and the principles of law applicable thereto, is a most important element to its proper determination, and it is a source of some satisfaction to be able to say that there are elementary principles pertaining to this subject of domicile, even though few in number, upon which practically all the text writers stand on common ground, to wit: (1) The domicile of the mother is the domicile of the illegitimate child, and the place of birth of the child is an immaterial element. (2) In a case of legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium the place of marriage does not affect the question. (3) Legitimation by a subsequent marriage depends upon the law of the domicile of the father. Dicey, Dom. p. 181, and other text writers, supported by many authorities, holding that the domicile of the father at the date of the birth is the vital inquiry, and other authority; Fras. Parent & Child, p. 52; Bar, Int. Law, p. 434; and Sav. Priv. Int. Law, p. 302,—holding that the domicile of the father at the date of marriage is the determinative fact. Inasmuch as the deceased, Blythe, was domiciled in California both at the time of the birth of the child and at the time he performed the acts which it is claimed resulted in legitimation, this question does not become an issue in the case, and we are not called upon to dispel the clouds of doubt that envelop it.

The contention of appellants that the status of a person residing in a foreign country, and a subject thereof, cannot be changed by acts performed in California under a provision of the law of our state legislature, cannot be supported as a rule without many exceptions, and to the extent of those exceptions a state law must be held, by its own courts at least, to have extraterritorial operation; and this principle of the foreign operation of state laws even goes to the extent that in many instances such laws are recognized and given effect by the courts of that particular foreign jurisdiction. The doctrine of extraterritorial operation of state laws is fully exemplified in the case of Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 340, where the court says: "It is a conceded principle that the laws of a state have no force proprio vigore beyond its territorial limits, but the laws of one state are frequently permitted by the courtesy of another to operate in the latter for the promotion of justice where neither that state nor its citizens will suffer any inconvenience from the application of the foreign law. This courtesy or comity is established, not only from high motives of respect for the laws and institutions of the foreign countries, but from considerations of mutual utility and advantage." The case of Burton v. Burton, *40 N. Y. 359, is a striking illustration of the operation of a law of the United States in affixing a different status to a foreign subject, resident in a foreign country. In that case, after plaintiff's marriage to Burton in a foreign land, he himself being a foreign resident and subject at the time, he emigrated to the state of New York, was naturalized, and there died. Although an actual resident of England at all times, upon the death of her husband she came to New York, and claimed her right of dower upon the ground that she was a citizen of the United States, made so by virtue of the naturalization of her husband under a general act of congress to that effect, and her claim was upheld. In conclusion the court uses this language: "It is said, furthermore, that she did not, by residence or in any way, assume the allegiance of the United States, or give her assent to the citizenship conferred by the act. This, however, was not necessary to entitle her to claim its benefits." In Headman v. Rose, 63 Ga. 458, the same question was again presented, and that court said: "When the claim was first presented here as to whether Mrs. Rose could claim to be a citizen of the United States under the provisions of that act of congress, (having never been in the United States until after the death of her husband,) we were all inclined to the opinion that she could not; but, upon a more careful examination of that statute in the light of the interpretation which has been given to it by the supreme court of North Carolina in Kane v. McCarthy, 63 N.C. 299, and by the court of appeals of New York in Burton v. Burton, *40 N. Y. 371, and in Kelly v. Owen, 7 Wall. 496, in which the supreme court of the United States cites the case of Burton v. Burton approvingly, we hold and decide that, if Mary Rose was married to William Rose, intestate, and he was a naturalized citizen of the United States, then she, by the terms and provisions of the act of congress of 1855, was also a citizen of the United States." It will be noticed that these decisions are not based upon the principle that the domicile of the husband was the domicile of the wife, and that consequently she was deemed to be in this country at the date of his naturalization, and therefore came under the operation of the act, but they rest upon the broad principle that congress has not only the power to say what aliens shall become citizens of the United States, but what acts shall create such citizenship. The fact that these cases bear upon the political status of the party, rather than upon his civil status, does not weaken their force and authority here. In principle no distinction can be discerned in this regard. In both cases there is involved an exercise of the same sovereign power. This doctrine has been carried to still greater lengths in criminal cases, where a crime has been committed in a foreign jurisdiction. In the Warrender Case, 2 Clark & F. 539, Lord Brougham remarked: "But it may be said that, the offense being committed abroad, and not within the Scotch territory, prevents the application to it of the Scotch criminal law. To this it may, however, be answered that, where a person has his domicile in a given country, the laws of that country to which he owes allegiance may visit even criminal offenses committed by him out of its territory. Of that we have many instances in our own jurisprudence. Murder and treason committed by Englishmen abroad are triable in England, and punishable here. Nay, by the bill which I introduced in 1811, and which is constantly acted upon, British subjects are liable to be convicted of felony for slave trading in whatever part of the world committed by them."

Section 215 of the Civil Code is as follows: "A child born before wedlock becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents." This section takes a wide range. Its operation is not confined within state lines. It is as general as language can make it. Oceans furnish no obstruction to the effect of its wise and beneficent provisions. It is manna to the bastards of the world. If Blythe, subsequent to the birth of plaintiff, had returned to England, and married Julia Perry, such marriage, under the provision of law just quoted, ipso facto would have resulted in the legitimation of Florence Blythe. Then, in answer to the interrogatory of appellants already noticed, we say that she was so domiciled that by the laws of California she could have been changed from bastardy to legitimacy. Our statute, conjoined with principles of international law, would have changed her bastardy to legitimacy in the world at large; and regardless of international law, and regardless of all law of foreign countries, our statute law alone would have made her legitimate in the world at large, whenever and however that question should present itself in the courts of California. And we also have here a most striking illustration of the extraterritorial operation of California law. We have the effect of a statute of this state attaching to a state of facts where the mother and child were never in California, but residing and domiciled in England, and the marriage taking place in England; and California law, as stated, has the effect upon that child to give it a different domicile, and completely change its status. Such would not only be the effect of this law upon the child viewed by California courts, but such would be its effect viewed by the courts of England, where the child was domiciled, and that, too, notwithstanding no provisions of law are there found for the legitimation of bastards. This assumption of Blythe's marriage to Julia Perry in its facts forms an exact photograph of the celebrated case of Munro v. Munro, found in 1 Rob. Scot. App. H. L. 492; a case crystalizing the judicial thought of the age upon the subject, and commanding the respect of all writers and judges upon the law of domicile. We shall make copious references and indulge in liberal quotations from that decision, for its legal soundness never has been questioned, and, as we view the subject, it casts a flood of light upon many matters involved in the investigation at hand.

Munro, a Scotch gentleman of fortune, domiciled in Scotland, while upon a visit to London, cohabited with an English woman, domiciled in England, and a child was the result of such cohabitation. He subsequently married the woman in England, and it was held under the law of Scotland, by the house of lords sitting as a court of appeal, (although, if it had been a case appealed from the English courts, the decision would undoubtedly have been the same,) that such child was thereby legitimated, Scottish laws providing for legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. It was there said: "It is maintained that the pursuer having been born in England of an English woman, not married at the time of the birth, she was born an illegitimate child; that that status of illegitimacy was indelible by the law of England; and that a subsequent marriage, even taking it to be a Scotch marriage, could not legitimate the child, or wipe off the indelible stain of illegitimacy. We cannot assent to this proposition, and, with all possible deference to any different opinions, we know of no authority for it in the law of Scotland, or among the jurists and writers on general law, in the application here attempted to be made of it. * * * To say again that because the child was born in England of an English mother her illegitimacy is indelible, if this means that it is indelible by the law of England, and under the law of England, is to say no more than that the law of England has not adopted the rule of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium; but if it be meant that because a child was born in England it cannot become legitimate in Scotland by a Scotch marrriage, is a question to be determined by the law of Scotland; it is a petitio principii, for which there is no authority whatever in that law. * * * We are here, in a Scotch question, and in a Scotch court, applying a plain rule of our law, and unless that law says that if a child be born in England it shall not have the benefit of the rule, we do not see how it is at all material that it could not enjoy it if the law of England were to be applied to the case; but we know of no exception in the law of Scotland, nor, as far as we are informed, is there any such exception recognized in the law of any country which holds the principle of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. We are not here giving any opinion on a point about which it does not belong to us to form any judgment. We are not inquiring what the law of England might decide, if the pursuer, or any person similarly situated, were making a claim in an English court of law in respect of property within their jurisdiction. * * * We are aware that conflicts of law may take place, and there is no help for it when they do occur; but the question before us is a purely Scotch question, to be ruled by general principles, no doubt, but still with reference to the law of Scotland in that particular point, and we cannot, in consistency with the established principles of that law, hold that this pursuer could not become legitimated by the marriage of her parents, when or wheresoever she may have been born. It appears to us to be very clear that the circumstance of the mother being English adds nothing at all to the supposed difficulty in the place of the pursuer's birth. She was certainly illegitimate by the law of England, and by the law of Scotland also, at the time of her birth, and she would have been so equally though her mother had been a Scotch woman. Lord MACKENZIE said: 'I cannot help entertaining doubt whether the indelibility of English bastardy has any meaning beyond this: that an English bastard is not legitimated by an English marriage. * * * But, suppose it were true that English bastardy is indelible, not only against a marriage in England, but against a marriage all the world over,—I say, suppose there was produced a statute providing and declaring that an English bastard, born in England, should remain a bastard all the world over, notwithstanding anything that could be done in any country, —I ask, could we give it effect? Could we acknowledge the authority of such a statute? I think we will be bound to say that the English parliament might rule the fate of the bastards in England, but that its laws were not entitled to extend to other countries, and that there was no principle of the law of nations which would give effect to such a statute.'" In summing up his conclusions, the lord chancellor, after holding Munro to be domiciled in Scotland, said: "If that be a correct conclusion from the evidence, it follows that the appellant in Munro v. Munro, being the child of a domiciled Scotchman, had at the moment of her birth a capacity of being legitimatized by the subsequent marriage of her parents for all civil purposes in Scotland, and that she accordingly, by their subsequent marriage in 1801, became legitimated, and, as such, capable of succeeding to the property in question."

The foregoing views of learned judges are in direct conflict with the arguments of appellants' counsel in this case; and such views were declared to be the law after able arguments there made upon the same lines as here presented. Appellants insist that the domicile of the child irrevocably fixes that child's status. In this case, subsequent to the child's birth, Julia Perry married a domiciled Englishman; hence her domicile was permanently established in England, and for that reason the child's domicile, being the mother's domicile, was permanently established there. Under appellants' reasoning this state of facts would forever debar the child from legitimation, for even its presence in California would avail nothing as against its English domicile. If such be good law, section 226 of the Civil Code, expressly authorizing the adoption of minors of other states, is bad law, for it is squarely in conflict with those views.

We find in Story's work upon Conflict of Laws (section 105*a*) the following: "Sixthly. As to issue born before the marriage, if by the law of the country where they are born they would be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents, they will, by such subsequent marriage, (perhaps in any country, but at all events in the same country,) become legitimate, so that this character of legitimacy will be recognized in every other country. If illegitimate there, the same character will belong to them in every other country." But Judge Story's citations in its support do not clearly bear him out, and legal authority to the effect that the place of birth forms no element in the case vastly preponderates. We have in Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257, a case involving additional elements, and therefore additional complications, even to those found in the Munro Case. The man was domiciled in Massachusetts. The woman was domiciled in Mayence. The illegitimate children were born in Frankfort on the Main, and the marriage occurred at that city. The Massachusetts law required not only a subsequent marriage, but a subsequent acknowledgment of the child. Upon this state of facts, and this provision of law, the child was held legitimate by the Massachusetts court, even though the acts of acknowledgment occurred in a foreign country. In the case of In re Grove, 40 Ch. Div. 216, Lord Chief Justice COTTON said: 'What is really necessary, I think, is that the father should at the time of the birth of the child be domiciled in the country allowing legitimation, so as to give to the child the capacity of being made legitimate by subsequent marriage; but it is the subsequent marriage which gives legitimacy to the child, who has at its birth, in consequence of its father's domicile, the capacity of being made legitimate by subsequent marriage." In the same case Lord Justice FRY stated: "The appellant claims through Sarah Thomegay, who was born in 1744, in this country, [England,] and was an illegitimate child of Mark Thomegay and Margaret Powis. At birth that child took the domicile of its mother, and it took the status of illegitimacy according to the law of the domicile of its mother, and it took also the capacity to change that status of illegitimacy for one of legitimacy, provided that, according to the law of the domicile of the father, the subsequent marriage would work legitimation. The position of such a child, therefore, is curious, taking domicile and status from the mother, but taking the potentiality of changing its status from its putative father." In the case of Shedden v. Patrick, 1 Macq. 535, the father being domiciled in the state of New York at the date of the child's birth, and there being no law of legitimation in New York, the child was declared illegitimate by the English courts.

Appellants' counsel confidently insist that Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, is valuable as an authority to support their views. After a careful examination of the opinion in that case, we are unable to perceive its force as authority here. A child was legally adopted in Pennsylvania. The adoptive parent removed with the child to Massachusetts, where the father became domiciled, and there died, leaving real estate in that commonwealth. The litigation arose upon a question as to who was entitled to inherit, and the court said: "We are, therefore, of the opinion that the legal status of the child of intestate, once acquired by the demandant under a statute and by a judicial decree of the state of Pennsylvania, while the parties were domiciled there, continued after their removal into this commonwealth, and that by virtue thereof the demandant is entitled to maintain this action." Respondent's position in this case controverts no principle of law there declared, and it is difficult to see how the court could have arrived at a different conclusion. The judgment would have been the same if the father had never changed his domicile to Massachusetts, and probably the same if there had been no law of adoption whatever in that state. Miller v. Miller, 91 N. Y. 315, in principle seems to have been that character of case, and the same conclusions were there arrived at by the court. In the celebrated case of Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 7 Clark & F. 936, to which the learned chief justice refers in his opinion in the Ross Case, the decision would have undoubtedly been in line with Ross v. Ross, if, in lieu of the statute of Merton, England's law of descent had been similar to the Massachusetts provision. The case of Foster v. Waterman, 124 Mass. 592, involves nothing but a single question of statutory construction, and in no manner supports the proposition that a resident of one state cannot adopt a child under the adoption laws of another state where such child is domiciled; but the Appeal of Wolf, (Pa. Sup.) 13 Atl. Rep. 760, does hold directly to the contrary of such contention.

The doctrine of indelibility of bastardy in England is not correct in its broadest sense, for it is in the power of parliament to legitimate bastards at any time.

Neither is the rule universal that a child legitimate in one country is legitimate in all the world. This principle of different status in different countries finds a striking illustration in Lolley's Case, Russ. & R. 236, reviewed and dissented from by Lord BROUGHAM in Warrender v. Warrender, supra. In that case the facts disclose that Lolley was married in England, divorced in Scotland, and upon his return to England, and making a second marriage, he was then tried and convicted of bigamy. Here we have a state of facts where, under the respective laws of England and Scotland, Lolley, after his divorce, and prior to his second marriage, was a married man in England, and an unmarried man in Scotland, and after his second marriage he had a lawful wife in Scotland, and a different lawful wife in England; thus having two lawful wives at the same time. It can hardly be said that Lolley's status was the same in both countries. A similar principle is applied to the legitimacy of children by subsequent marriage. Section 215 applies to all bastards where the father is domiciled in California. Its provisions would operate upon and legitimate a child born of a father who at the time of its conception and birth was the husband of another woman, or would apply to an incestuous bastard. Such was expressly declared to be the law under a similar provision of a state statute in the case of Hawbecker v. Hawbecker, 43 Md. 516, the court saying: "No doubt the legislature, in thus making the civil rule of the common law, intended to hold out to the sinning parents an inducement to marry, and thus to put a stop to the mischiefs of further illicit intercourse between them; but, in our opinion, the main purpose and intent of the enactment we are now considering was to remove the taint and disabilities of bastardy from the unoffending children whenever their parents did marry, without regard to the deepness of guilt on the part of their parents in which they were conceived and born." Such a child, under the canon law, would be deemed an adulterine or incestuous bastard, incapable of legitimation, and in the courts of certain countries where that law controls would not be recognized as legitimate. Thus is presented a case—and by no means an anomalous one—where the child would be legitimate in California and illegitimate by the laws of various other countries.

We have quoted thus extensively from the authorities upon the subject of domicile as especially bearing upon the question of legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium for the reason that we are unable to perceive any difference in the general principles of law bearing upon that character of legitimation and in those principles bearing upon other forms of legitimation authorized by the same statute. The only distinction claimed by appellants is that legitimation founded upon subsequent marriage is based upon the fiction of law that a previous consent existed, and the marriage related back to that time. Upon this point it would seem all-sufficient to say that our statute does not recognize such a fiction, and its effective operation in no wise depends upon the assumption of its presence. Times are not what they once were, and we live in an age too practical to build our law upon the unstable foundation of fictions. In Birtwhistle v. Vardill, supra, Lord Chief Justice TYNDAL, in speaking upon this question, says: "Pothier, on the other hand, when he speaks of the effect of a subsequent marriage in legitimating children born before it, disclaims the authority of the canon law; nor does he mention any fiction of an antecedent marriage, but rests the effect upon the positive law of the country. He first instances the custom of Troyes, and then adds * * * that it is a common right received throughout the whole kingdom." Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 226, says: "The principle to which the law of legislation per subsequens matrimonium is to be referred has been a subject of controversy. The canonists base the law, not on general views of expediency and justice, but upon a fiction, which they adopted in order to reconcile the new law with established rules, for, assuming that as a general rule children are not legitimate unless born in lawful wedlock, they declared that by a fiction of law parents were married when the child was born. Such reasoning—by no means uncommon when the wise saw more clearly what was right than why it was so—has not stood the test of modern logic, and the Scotch courts have placed the rule once more where its imperial founders left it, namely, on the ground of general policy and justice."

Upon principle no distinction can be made between the rules of law applicable to these various forms of legitimation. Many of the states of this Union, in order to effect those ends, require, in addition to a subsequent marriage, that the father (in some states both father and mother) shall also acknowledge the child. This is the case of Loring v. Thorndike, supra, where the marriage not only took place in foreign territory, but, as is said in Miller v. Miller, supra, the facts of the acknowledgment occurred in a foreign jurisdiction. Thus, Massachusetts law required marriage and acknowledgment, and invoked the rule of domicile of the husband to establish the capacity of the child for legitimation. Section 2405 of the Revised Code of Alabama allows legitimation of a bastard child simply by acknowledgment of the father in writing, certified and recorded. No consent of the mother is required; no notice to or consent of the child is demanded. If such a statute were found within the lids of the Civil Code of this state, under the facts of this case as they appear upon the question of domicile, Blythe, by following the requirements of the provision of the law there laid down, could legitimate his illegitimate child. Civil Code, § 215, declares that marriage ipso facto results in legitimation; and section 230 declares that acknowledgment, accompanied by certain other acts, shall result in legitimation. If the principle of the domicile of the father is good law where marriage and acknowl edgment are both required to accomplish the result, that principle is no less good law when applied to marriage alone, under section 215, or when applied to acknowledgment alone, under the Alabama Code, or when applied to acknowledgment accompanied by other acts, under section 230 of the Civil Code of this state.

Dicey says, (page 192:) "Question. What is the effect, according to English law, of a person being made legitimate by the authority of a foreign sovereign? Suppose that a person born illegitimate is legitimated by a decree of the czar of Russia, will such a person be held legitimate here? There is no English authority on the subject. The most probable answer is (it is conceived) that the effect of such a decree would, like the effect of a subsequent marriage of the parents, depend on the domicile of such person's father at the time of the birth. Suppose, that is to say, that D., the child's father, were domiciled in Russia at the time of the child's birth, the decree would have the effect of making the child legitimate in England. A person, on the other hand, born of a father domiciled in England, could not be made legitimate here by the force of any foreign law."

Bar, in his International Law, has discussed this identical question at length, although it can scarcely be said to be even incidentally mentioned in the works of either Savigny, Foote, Phillimore, or Schaffner. He says, (section 198:) "In what we have said we have proceeded on the footing that legitimation, if the consent of the child be validly given, is dependent solely on the personal law of the father, and that, therefore, if this law allows legitimation by an act of the head of the state, it matters not to inquire whether some other legal system, in particular the personal law which the child has hitherto enjoyed, recognizes this legitimation, but that, on the contrary, legitimation per rescriptum is to be regarded in international law on exactly the same footing as legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. This opinion, which, as we think, is the prevailing opinion in German jurisprudence, and in which, too, Fiore, § 149; Phillimore, § 542; and Wharton, § 249,—concur, has, however, often been disputed. In the first place, it has been said that an act of that kind by a sovereign must necessarily have its operation confined to the dominions of that sovereign, for he has no authority beyond these limits; but if it be true generally that the personal law of the father is the rule, that law must be allowed to say that legitimation can take place by means of an act of that kind. The legitimation is to be recognized, not because the sovereign is to exercise sovereign rights in another country, but because the personal law is to have effect there. The opposite opinion, which is held by older writers, is no doubt explained, and to some extent justified, by the imperfect legal capacity which, in the middle ages, and in many territories down to later times, clung to the bastard, especially, too, as the sole result of legitimation, even in the territory of the sovereign who bestowed it, was in many cases merely to withdraw the estate of the person so legitimated upon his death from the grasp of his sovereign. * * * But, in the second place, the more modern French school, while they reject the view of the older writers as to the effect of the legitimation being necessarily confined to the territory of the sovereign who bestows it, refuse to recognize this kind of legitimation unless it is also recognized in the personal law which the child has hitherto enjoyed. In this way, one who has hitherto been a French child in respect that the Civil Code has never sanctioned legitimation per rescriptum, can never be legitimated by the act of a foreign sovereign. But Laurent, in arguing in support of this doctrine that legitimation touches the status of persons, and that this status must be determined everywhere of Frenchmen by the law of France, proves too much. This rule would have to hold also in the cases of legitimation by subsequent marriage, so that in this case also the personal law of the child would be the only rule." In this connection, and as bearing directly and emphatically upon the general principles involved in the solution of the important question presented by this branch of the case, we again quote from Bar, § 194: "If the personal law of the child requires more conditions to be observed before it will pronounce that a child has been legitimated, the reason of that is not any anxiety for the interest of the child, so much as for that of the father and his family, e. g. the other children, his collateral relations; but the state, to which the child has up to that moment belonged, has no interest in that matter, and, if that legal system which is charged with the protection of the family is willing to hold the child legitimated, there is in truth no conflict between the two systems. That system to which the child has hitherto belonged says: 'If the father belonged to me, I would not hold the child to be legitimated.' That involved no contradiction of the other system, which says: 'Since the father belongs to me, I do hold the child to be legitimated.' No doubt we must assume that assent of the child is given in due legal form, for legitimation can only take place against the child's wish if the personal law of the child forces that upon him or her, but in by far the greater number of cases it will be beyond all doubt that the legitimation is advantageous to the child, and the child or its guardian can subsequently signify its approval of and found upon it." Legitimation is the creature of legislation. Its existence is solely dependent upon the law and policy of each particular sovereignty. The law and policy of this state authorize and encourage it, and there is no principle upon which California law and policy, when invoked in California courts, shall be made to surrender to the antagonistic law and policy of Great Britain. It was said in Munro v. Munro: "We are here in a Scotch question, and in a Scotch court applying a plain rule of our law, and unless that law says that, if a child be born in England, it shall not have the benefit of the rule, we do not see how that it is at all material that it could not enjoy it if the law of England were to be applied to the case;" and again: "We are not inquiring what the law of England might decide if the person were making a claim in an English court of law in respect of property within their jurisdiction." And we say here plaintiff was the child of Blythe, who was a domiciled citizen of the state of California. She founds her claim upon the statutes of this state, and is now here invoking the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. It is a question of California law, to be construed in California courts, and we see nothing in our constitution or statutory law, or in international law, to have prevented Blythe from making the plaintiff his daughter in every sense that the word implies. In conclusion, we hold that Blythe, being domiciled in the state of California both at the time of the birth of plaintiff and at the time he performed the acts which it is claimed resulted in the legitimation of plaintiff, and California law authorizing the legitimation of bastards by the doings of certain acts, it follows that Florence Blythe, the plaintiff, at all times was possessed of a capacity for legitimation under section 230 of the Civil Code of this state.

We pass to an examination of the second branch of the discussion involved in the consideration of section 230, namely, if plaintiff's situation endowed her with the capacity for legitimation, did the acts of Blythe bring her within the requirements of the statute? Those requirements are: (1) He shall publicly acknowledge the child as his own; (2) he shall receive it as his child, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family; (3) he shall otherwise treat it as if it were a legitimate child. As to these matters, the trial court found in detail the facts to be that Blythe had fulfilled every requirement of the statute. These findings are strenuously attacked, as being unsupported by the evidence, and we are called upon to pass upon its sufficiency in this regard. This section of the Code is entitled to a liberal construction, because section 4 provides: "The rule of the common law that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed has no application to this Code. The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and promote justice." By virtue of this provision, the court, in the case of In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 419, 21 Pac. Rep. 976, and 22 Pac. Rep. 742, 1028, has expressly declared that this section shall have a liberal construction; but, as there said: "Liberal construction does not mean enlargement or restriction of a plain provision of a written law. If a provision of the Code is plain and unambiguous, it is the duty of the court to enforce it as written. If it is ambiguous, or doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such liberality of construction is to be indulged as, within the fair interpretation of its language, will effect its apparent object, and promote justice." Did Blythe acknowledge the plaintiff to be his own child? The word "acknowledge" has no technical meaning, and in its ordinary acceptation is defined by Webster "to own or admit the knowledge of." It is not necessary to dwell at great length upon this special element necessary to satisfy the statute. Under the evidence it can hardly be considered debatable. Blythe declared the plaintiff to be his child to all persons upon all occasions. He was garrulous upon the subject. Aside from his business occupations, his mind ever rested upon his relations to the child, and it was his common topic of conversation. If necessary to this decision, it could almost be held that he shouted it from the housetops. He acknowledged the child to its mother and to its grandmother before it was born, and subsequently in no single instance was he ever heard to deny its paternity. It was named and baptized Florence Blythe, at his request, and ever after has been known to the world as Florence Blythe. Authority is not necessary to be cited to support this branch of the case, but In re Jessup, supra, is not only in accord with this position, but conclusive in its favor. This acknowledgment was also public, for, as we have seen, the thought of concealment of the paternity of the child never entered his mind. Why should it, when it is entirely apparent from the evidence that he was proud of such paternity?

Did Blythe receive it as his child, with the consent of his wife, into his family? Blythe had no wife, and that element of the statute is eliminated from the case. No construction of the statute, however rigid, would hold the existence of a wife necessary before the benefits to be derived under this section could possibly attach to an illegitimate child. This question of the wife's consent can only be a material element when there is a wife to consent. In re Jessup fully recognizes and necessarily adopts this principle, for in that case, as here, the father of the child had no wife to consent, and such fact would thus have defeated plaintiff's claims at the very threshold of the litigation. It may be conceded for the purposes of this case that, if Blythe had a family, such child must have been received therein, or the statute would not have been satisfied; but, as we have seen, if Blythe had no wife to consent, that requirement has no standing here; so, if he had no family into which the child could have been received, that element is foreign to the case. Under the rule of liberal construction laid down in the case of In re Jessup, such must necessarily be the law. To give that meaning to the statute by which all men who have no families are debarred from legitimating their illegitimate offspring, would be to give the section a harsh and illiberal construction. Unless the provision is so plain and explicit as to amount to an express inhibition to that effect, upon every principle of right and justice we could not so hold. The rule of construction, as declared in the Jessup Case, is that, if the statute is ambiguous or doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such construction is to be indulged as within the fair interpretation of its language will effect its apparent object and purpose. Section 1866 of the Code of Civil Procedure further provides: "When a statute or instrument is equally susceptible of two interpretations, one in favor of natural right, and the other against it, the former is to be adopted." Applying these tests of statutory construction to this provision, but one result can flow therefrom, and that is, the existence of a family no more than the existence of a wife is an indispensable element to a complete and perfect adoption (or legitimation, more properly speaking) under this provision of law. This view is fully borne out by the decision in Re Jessup. It is said in the decision of the court in that case, referring to Jessup· "As he had no home and no family, in the strict sense of a collective body of persons who live in one house and under one head or manager,—a household including parents, children, and servants,—it would not be a fair or liberal construction to say that the child had not been adopted or acknowledged because he had not been received in such a home, or made a member of such family." It is needless to say that the Jessup Case was considered with the care that its importance demanded, for the record discloses that fact; and it may be suggested that upon this question alone the court stood together. Indeed, the learned counsel representing appellants in that case throughout their arguments conceded such to be the law. Blythe had no family. The court found that he was living with a mistress in San Francisco from the year 1880 to the time of his death. He appears to have lived in lodging houses during all these years. He had no relations, save of the collateral line, and they were at all times residing in a foreign country. He had not seen them or communicated with them for more than 10 years prior to his death, and at no time had he seen any of them or communicated with any of them since Florence Blythe, the plaintiff, was born. If he had a family, either this mistress or these collateral kindred constituted that family. Such cannot be the fact, and it would be a travesty upon the word to so hold. It was held in the Jessup Case that the father had a family in the sense of brothers and sisters, with whom he was brought into frequent contact, and from whom he concealed and to whom he denied the paternity of the child, and for these reasons and others the court held there was no adoption. There are no facts in this case in the slightest degree comparable to those there presented. In that case the language of the court as to this point bears directly upon the question of acknowledgment, and not as to the reception into the family; and we have already seen that a public acknowledgment was made by Blythe against which nothing can be said. If the term "receiving it into his family" does not necessarily mean an actual reception into an actual family, but may mean a constructive reception into a constructive family, then such measure of requirement is filled to the brim. Plaintiff was baptized in Blythe's name, at his request. Their correspondence indicates hearts filled with mutual affection. Her picture looked down upon him from its place upon the wall. At his rooms her name was a household word.

We pass to the examination of the remaining element of the statute, to wit: "He shall otherwise treat it as a legitimate child." If the father has publicly acknowledged the child to be his child, and has taken it into his family, it would seem but little remained to be done to wash away forever the stain of bastardy. The public acknowledgment of the child is the main fact. It is the important factor in the eyes of the statute. If the child was publicly acknowledged and received into the family, it would be a novel case where a court of equity would close its doors and refuse to declare a legitimation because the child was poorly clothed and illy fed. That case has not yet arisen, and it is hoped and believed it never will. The statute clearly means that the father must treat his illegitimate child as he would naturally treat his legitimate child, not as the majority of men in his financial circumstances would or should treat their children. Every man furnishes the rule by which he must be measured. No imaginary standard of excellence can be created, and then it be demanded that Blythe shall rise to that standard. If appellants' contention be true, a child whose father was an ignorant man, believing education an evil to be shunned, and who therefore denied an education to the child, could not be granted legitimation. Upon appellants' theory, an illegitimate child, whose father was a miser, would be compelled to bear forever the stain of bastardy. While Blythe was a man of large property interests, his estates were heavily involved. Money was required in many channels, and it is not probable that he had any surplus of cash on hand. Plaintiff was well clothed and well fed. It appears that at no time was she deprived of the necessaries of life. She resided at all times either with her mother or her grandfather. Blythe furnished something near $150 a year for her support. Certainly during her infancy this was entirely sufficient, and no complaints were made to him that more money was needed to meet her wants. At all these times he himself was either stopping in a log house in the mountains of Trinity, or living with his mistress in lodgings in San Francisco, surrounded by his dogs, birds, and cats, while his hens were located upon the roof. It may well be inferred from the simplicity of his own life, as indicated by the foregoing circumstances, that, if legitimate children had been born to him, they would have been treated, as far as pecuniary expenditures were concerned, upon the same lines as this illegitimate child was treated. He made a will, which was subsequently lost or destroyed, wherein he provided for her. He corresponded with her as a father would correspond with his little daughter. He had her christened in the name of Florence Blythe. Her health, her education, and her religion were matters in which he exercised the utmost concern. She occupied his thoughts, and her name was upon his lips in his dying hour. For these reasons, it may well be said that "he otherwise treated her as a legitimate child."

We pass to an examination of section 1387 of the Civil Code, upon which plaintiff relies to constitute herself an heir of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. That section declares, inter alia, that "every illegitimate child is an heir of any person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child." It is unnecessary to decide whether this provision effects the status of a child, or whether it is alone a statute of descent. If it either directly or indirectly touches upon her status, our views upon the question, as herein previously expressed, are applicable. If it is a statute of descent pure and simple,—and Estate of Magee, 63 Cal. 414, seems to so declare in explicit terms,—then the plaintiff is entitled to all the benefits of it, regardless of domicile, status, or extraterritorial operation of state laws. The rules of liberal construction applicable to section 230 are likewise to be invoked in the consideration of section 1387, and the obvious purpose and intent of the legislature in making this enactment was to entitle illegitimate children to inherit their father's estate the same as legitimate children. Did the intestate, Blythe, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledge that he was the father of the claimant, Florence Blythe? Upon an inspection of the provision, we see that the word "acknowledge" must be viewed in the light of its ordinary acceptation, and it is therefore used in exactly the same sense as when found in section 230. The acts required to constitute the acknowledgment are not laid down in the statute. No stated form of acknowledgment is there found by which we may be guided. Again, we must take this statute as we find it. We are not here to construct a statute, but to construe a statute. We can neither interpolate nor eliminate, and we are bound to assume that the legislature enacted the law as it now stands with a due comprehension of the meaning of words, and of the rules of statutory construction, and that they incorporated into the act all that was intended, and that they intended that effect should be given to all that was found therein.

The writings relied upon in this case to bring plaintiff within the provisions of the statute are various letters, written at different times by Blythe to his daughter and her grandfather, which letters were signed by him in the presence of W. H. H. Hart, who was a competent witness. These letters, as to the question of acknowledgment of relationship, are of the same general character and import, and our investigation will be limited to the consideration of two of them,—one a letter to the grandfather, and the other a letter to the daughter,—either of which, to our minds, fully satisfies the statute. He writes a letter to the plaintiff, from which we quote: "My darling child: You have made your father very happy by writing to him your little letter. * * * But I feel sad to learn that my own dear child has been sick, and her papa not being near to help her. You say you wonder when you shall see your dear papa. Well, my dear child, it is about like this: Your papa * * *. After that your papa will leave San Francisco, * * * and have his dear Florence with him always. * * * I should like my dear daughter to write to her papa a letter once every month. * * * Grant is now laying at my feet, while his master is writing his first letter to his own darling child far away. * * * May God bless you, my dear child. From your loving father, THOMAS H. BLYTHE." The letter to the grandfather was read to said Hart, and signed in his presence. We quote: "I look at the proposed baptism of dear Flora as a matter of very deep importance. After full deliberation, I think it best to have Flora brought up in the Episcopal Church,—Church of England. You will therefore please have my daughter christened at once, and have her named after her father, Florence Blythe." There can be but one construction placed upon these letters, and that is they mean that Florence was the daughter of Thomas H. Blythe,—"his own dear child." These letters acknowledge the relationship of father and daughter, not hesitatingly and grudgingly, but willingly, gladly, and entirely. When a father says, "You are my own darling child;" "I am your father; you shall be baptized in my name, and loved, cherished and protected always,"—the subject is exhausted, the cup of acknowledgment is filled to overflowing. If letters are entitled to be used as writings to prove the fact of acknowledgment, these letters prove that fact. It was decided in Bailey v. Boyd, 59 Ind. 297, under a statute requiring the father to acknowledge his illegitimate child subsequent to marriage, before such child should be held legitimate, that "it was not necessary that this acknowledgment should have been expressed in words, but it may fairly be inferred from the acts and conduct of the elder Bazil." But it is now insisted that the writing must be a writing specially prepared for the sole object of making the illegitimate child an heir of the father. The adjudications of courts are not favorable to this view. In the case of Rice v. Efford, 3 Hen. & M. 227, it was held that the recognition of the illegitimate child in a will as the testator's child, the will being void as a will, was sufficient to entitle him to inherit; Chief Justice TUCKER, in this connection, saying in Stones v. Keeling, reported in the same volume, upon the following page: "The act of 1785, it should be remembered, relates to the disposition of property only, and proceeds to show who shall be admitted to share the property of a person dying intestate, notwithstanding any former legal bar to a succession thereto; and in that light the law ought to receive the most liberal construction, it being evidently the design of the legislature to establish the most liberal and extensive rules of succession to estates in favor of all in whose favor the intestate himself, had he made a will, might have been supposed to be influenced; and here there can be no doubt, had he died testate, that these daughters would have been the first object of his care." Reading the present case in the light of the evidence furnished by the record, there can be no doubt but, if Blythe had died testate, Florence would have been the first object of his care. In Succession of Fletcher, 11 La. Ann. 60, Henry Fletcher, in an act of manumission, made before a notary and witnesses, described the party enfranchised by his act as his "natural daughter slave," and such was held to be a sufficient acknowledgment of paternity, under a statute which declared that "the acknowledgment of an illegitimate child shall be made by a declaration executed before a notary public, in the presence of two witnesses." In that case the court, citing French authorities, held: "It is said that the words 'natural daughter slave' were terms of description foreign to the purpose of the act, used to manumit a slave, and not to acknowledge her paternity, but no form is prescribed for such an acknowledgment save only that the declaration be made before a notary public, in presence of two witnesses. If the declaration be thus made, it seems to be immaterial whether it be the main object of the act or not." In Remy v. Municipality, 11 La. Ann. 159, the court, in referring to the acknowledgment of paternity made in a will, said: "This document, it is true, was intended to be a will, and has never been admitted to probate as such, but, though not binding as a will, it is certainly good as acknowledgment of paternity, made in due form." Section 1387 is essentially a statute of inheritance, and there is no more fitting place for the father to recognize the moral duty enjoined upon him towards his illegitimate offspring than by acknowledging that child in his last will and testament, in accordance with the provisions of that section; and the fact that the acknowledgment was subsidiary to the main object and purpose of the testator in making the document would not thereby weaken the effect of the writing as an acknowledgment.

Under the statute of Indiana, marriage and subsequent acknowledgment of the paternity of the child by the father constituted a legitimation of the child, and in the case of Brock v. State, 85 Ind. 397, where the father married the woman and acknowledged the child for the sole purpose of escaping a prosecution for bastardy, and with the intention, at the time of the marriage, to immediately abandon the mother and child, it was held that such intentions were entirely immaterial, and that his acts created a legitimation. In Crane v. Crane, 31 Iowa, 296, the question here involved squarely presented itself. The statute of Iowa provided for legitimation by a recognition in writing of the illegitimate child by the father. Two propositions upon which appellants insist are directly decided against them in that case. It was held that a formal writing of recognition was not necessary, but that letters to a friend would suffice; and it was further held that the references to the child in the letters were sufficient to constitute recognition. The references by the father in those letters to the child as his child, while quite clear, are weak, vague, and unconvincing when compared to the references upon the same subject found in the letters of Blythe. A majority of the states of this Union, and also various countries of Europe, require the illegitimate child to be recognized or acknowledged by the father before legitimation takes place, yet no authority has been cited from any state or country, (and we therefore confidently assume there is none,) except the case of Pina v Peck, 31 Cal. 359, to which our attention shall be presently directed, which holds that a formal recognition or formal acknowledgment is necessary in order to constitute a legitimation.

It is insisted that the witness Hart should have subscribed his name to the writing as a witness thereto, but "competent witness" and "subscribing" or "attesting" witness are in no sense synonymous terms. In Re Noble, 124 Ill 270, 15 N. E. Rep. 850, the court says: "'Credible witnesses,' as used in the statute relating to wills, has been construed, both in England and this country, to mean 'competent witnesses;' that is, such persons as are not legally disqualified from testifying in courts of justice by reason of mental incapacity, interest, or the commission of crime, or other cause excluding them from testifying generally, or rendering them incompetent in respect of the particular subject-matter, or in the particular suit." As before remarked, it is not the duty of the court to add to or subtract from the words of the statute. We must construe it as it stands enacted. If the legislature had intended such witness to be a "subscribing" or "attesting" witness, it was easy for it to have said so. Not having so declared, it would be judicial legislation for this court to so hold the statute to be. Section 1940 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a writing may be proved by any one who saw it executed, and we cannot say but that such proof was contemplated by the legislature when it framed this provision of the statute. Our Codes contain many instances where the term "attesting witness" or "subscribing witness" is used, when the signature of the witness is required to give life to a written instrument, and we must presume that the legislature did not intend that the writing should be signed when it did not so declare. In all the statutes of the various states, wherever the signature of a witness to any document is required we find the statute either using the words "attesting witness" or "subscribing witness." Under the liberal rules of construction by which this court must be guided, and under the principle laid down by Chief Justice TUCKER in Stones v. Keeling, we are not called upon to defeat this plaintiff's claims by holding that the words "competent witness," as used in the statute, should be construed to mean "attesting" or "subscribing" witness. The law of Pennsylvania requires that the will of a married woman shall be executed in the presence of two witnesses; and the court said in Combs' Appeal, 105 Pa. St. 159: "Such witnesses were not required to subscribe their names thereto." If more need be said on this behalf, we would suggest that this statute was originally copied from a statute of the state of Maine, which also used the words "competent witness," but subsequently the legislature of that state amended the statute by causing it to read "and attested by a competent witness;" that legislature thus recognizing, not only the fact that legislation was necessary in order that the witness should be required to sign the writing, but also that it was a matter with which the legislature should deal, and with which the courts had no concern. It is a familiar principle of statutory construction that a statute taken and enacted from the laws of another state carries with it the construction given to it by the laws of that state. The amendment made to the statute of Maine clearly indicates what construction was there given this provision of section 1387. In speaking as to the construction of statutes relating to the form and manner of making wills, the court said in Re Simpson, 56 How. Pr. 126: "The restrictions which from motives of prudence are thrown around the right should be construed liberally in favor of the testament, and forms should not be required which the legislature has not plainly prescribed." The question as to the wisdom and policy of this provision is not a matter for our consideration. This court is not the forum to administer relief for evil in this law, if evil there be. If the law is not what it should be, let the legislature follow the course adopted by the state from which it took the law, and amend the statute in this regard, as that state has done. As the law is now written, compliance has been had with it, and, having determined that matter, the investigation is concluded, as far as this court is concerned.

It is further insisted that the letters, when placed in the crucible by which they are to be tested, are found wanting, because it is said that the writing must be complete in itself; that is, it must show upon its face that the child is an illegitimate child, and that it was signed in the presence of a competent witness. We find nothing in the law subjecting the writing to any such test. The statute does not require it. Such recitals would not add one jot to the weight and credit to be given to the writing by the court, if they were there found stated. They would have no more weight and be of no more avail in arriving at a final determination of the merits of the cause than if Blythe had said in the writing: "I made this writing, and the facts therein stated are true." A statement in the writing that it was signed in the presence of a competent witness could not be evidence of that fact; no more would a reference in the writing to the child as an illegitimate child establish such illegitimacy. In Grant v. Mitchell, 83 Me. 26, 21 Atl. Rep. 178, the court, in speaking to this question, said: "In either case it must first appear that the child is illegitimate. The statute does not, nor does it purport to, act upon any other; nor does the subsequent marriage, adoption, or acknowledgment have any tendency to prove this fact. Whatever may be the effect of the acknowledgment in showing the paternity of one proved to be illegitimate, it cannot be determinative as proof of the illegitimacy." Blythe, in writing, acknowledged himself to be the father of Florence Blythe; Florence Blythe is an illegitimate child; therefore, Blythe acknowledged himself to be the father of an illegitimate child. This logic is unassailable, and no sound reason can be adduced why the acknowledgment should contain a declaration of bastardy.

Bearing upon both branches of this case, as to the policy of the law and the true principle of construction to be invoked, we quote the apt language of Beatty, C. J., in the Jessup Case, page 435, 81 Cal., and page 750, 22 Pac. Rep., and the views there expressed in no wise conflict with the principles declared in the main opinion of the court. He says: "The only argument that can be made against his claim to inherit his father's estate rests upon a strict construction of the statutes remedial in their nature, designed to secure to innocent unfortunates in his situation a just measure of the rights to which they are by nature as fully entitled as are legitimate offspring. No doubt a strong argument can be built on this basis of strict construction against the decision of the superior court. But I adhere to the view so strongly put and so satisfactorily maintained by Justice Works in his opinion: that in cases of this kind the only strictness required is in proof of paternity. That being satisfactorily established by plenary proof, I think courts should lean strongly in favor of a finding that the father of an illegitimate child has done what every honest and humane man should be not only willing, but eager, to do, and what a just law would compel the unwilling to do. I also think it a wholly unauthorized construction of the statute that the acts of recognition, acknowledgment, etc., necessary to legitimize a natural child, should be performed with the express intention on the part of the father of accomplishing that object. If the acts are in themselves such as the statute prescribes, I think they confer legitimacy without any reference to the intent with which they are performed. There is no danger to morality in recognizing the natural rights of illegitimate children, as against their fathers, or other claimants of their estates; and there is no danger of encouraging the fabrication of spurious claims, so long as strict proof of paternity is insisted upon." The foregoing views are not in harmony with the principles declared in the elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Rhodes, in the case of Pina v. Peck, 31 Cal. 359, and upon which decision appellants, in the main, rest this branch of their case. It is not our intention to analyze the soundness of the legal principles laid down in that opinion, otherwise than may have been incidentally done in what we have already said. Still, we might be allowed to say no authority of courts or men learned in the law is presented in that opinion to support the views there declared, although, as we have seen, authority is not wanting to the contrary. Pina v. Peck is not authority in this case, for two sufficient reasons: First. But four justices participated in the decision, (Justice Sanderson not taking part,) and two of these justices concurred alone in the judgment. This fact entirely destroys the effect of the decision as an authority upon any and all matters therein discussed. Secondly. Justice RHODES says at the very inception of his opinion: "It is contended by the defendants that this provision of the statute is in derogation of the common law, and must, therefore, be strictly construed. That doctrine was announced and applied by the court in Estate of Sanford, 4 Cal. 12, and we are of the opinion that the ruling is correct beyond a doubt. As a consequence resulting from the operation of this rule, the acknowledgment must conform to the statute, and be complete in itself; that is to say, it must not require the aid of extrinsic evidence. When the parties are identified, and the instrument in writing is produced and proven, the court must be able to say from the instrument that the person who signed it thereby acknowledged himself to be the father of the illegitimate child therein named." Thus this decision was expressly based upon strict and rigid rules of statutory construction, and, as we have seen, those rules of construction have now been entirely displaced as to the Codes by rules liberal and humane in their character. That decision being expressly based upon strict rules of construction, and strict rules of construction now being abolished, it cannot be said to be binding authority in a case which we are called upon to decide by an application of statutory rules of liberal construction. It is insisted that the following rule of construction, as declared by Judge Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, (page 66,) must be invoked in this case, to wit: "It has ever properly been held that the legislature, by enacting without material alteration a statute which has been judicially expounded by the highest court of the state, must be presumed to have intended that the same words should be received in the new statute in the sense which had been attributed to them in the old." There can be no question but that, if the rules of statutory construction were the same now as when Pina v. Peck was decided, and the views there expressed had been adopted by a majority of the court, this principle of the construction of statutes would have controlling effect in this case; but it is equally true that, if the rules of construction have been changed, such principle, in the very nature of things, could not maintain. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

Chief Justice BEATTY and Justice HARRISON, being disqualified, do not participate in the foregoing decision.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance upon the ground that the plaintiff is the heir of the deceased under section 1387 of the Civil Code. But I dissent from the proposition that plaintiff was adopted by deceased under section 230. Section 230 provides that "the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he be married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it." There can be a compliance with this section only by doing the three things which it requires to be done, viz.: The father must publicly acknowledge the child; he must receive it into his family; and he must otherwise treat it "as if it were a legitimate child." Assuming that the deceased, in the case at bar, did the first of these three things, he certainly, in my opinion, did not do either of the other two. It is clear that he did not receive the plaintiff into his family; in fact, there is no pretense that he did so. He had no family, and therefore, of course, did not receive her into his family. It is said that, as he had no family, he could not have received her into it; nevertheless the fact remains that he did not do so, and therefore did not comply with the said section of the Code. How can there be compliance with a statute in the absence of conditions contemplated by the statute, and absolutely necessary to give it effect? The provision of the Code in question assumes the existence of a family; and it assumes that there may be a family in which there is no wife, because it provides that, if there be a wife, she must consent to receive the illegitimate child into the family. Either a widow or a bachelor, as we all know, may have a family, viz. "a collective body of persons living together under one head or manager." In order to make the statute applicable it is not necessary that there should be a living wife in the family. It might have provided that the child should be received into a family in which there was a wife; and, in that event, no reception into any other kind of a family would have been sufficient. But it does not so provide. The provision is that the child must be received into the father's family; and that, if there be a wife, she must consent. There must, however, be a family into which the child can be received; and, when that condition is not present, the provision of the Code under discussion can have no operation. There is no question here of strict or liberal construction. If it were true that there ought to be a strained construction in favor of illegitimate as against legitimate children, (and the law would be just the same if legitimate children were contestants,) still the statute would not bear the tension by which plaintiff seeks to stretch it. The language of the Code seems to me plain. It provides that under certain conditions an illegitimate child may be adopted by certain acts, but when those conditions do not exist it cannot by such acts be adopted. And if it be necessary to look beneath the plain language of the section of the Code in question to discover the intent of the legislature when enacting it, there is no difficulty in seeing it. It was clearly the intent that, in the absence of documentary evidence, the claims of asserted illegitimate children should not succeed upon loose oral statements about disjointed and uncertain acts and declarations of deceased persons, but that there should be such continuous and unequivocal acts as reception into the family, and treatment there as legitimate children in the face of the world. One having no family can adopt the other mode, and can, by a written acknowledgment in the presence of a competent witness, make his illegitimate child his heir, as provided in section 1387 of the Civil Code, or may provide for it by will.

I am aware that in the opinion of the court delivered in Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 21 Pac. Rep. 976, and 22 Pac. Rep. 742, 1028, views were expressed different from those above stated, but they were not necessary to the decision of that case, and mere dicta, and, I think, incorrect. I concurred in that opinion, but as I was thoroughly convinced that the facts in that case did not bring it within the Code, under that construction of it, I must have failed to consider as thoroughly as I should have done the views above referred to. Upon mature reflection, I am satisfied that they are wrong. Neither do I think that the deceased in the case at bar complied with the third requirement of said section 230, —he did not "otherwise treat plaintiff as if she were a legitimate child." To treat a child "as if it were a legitimate child" is to treat it as ordinary people usually treat their legitimate children, considering their circumstances in life. Did the deceased do this? Can any one think that if plaintiff had been his legitimate child, born in lawful wedlock, he would not have treated her differently? Without reviewing the evidence here, I venture to say that, considering all the circumstances, no instance can be found in modern civilized life where a father treated a legitimate child in the manner in which the deceased treated the plaintiff. The case of the plaintiff here appeals, no doubt, strongly to human sympathies. The deceased was a millionaire, and had no legitimate children, and, so far as yet discovered, the plaintiff is his only illegitimate child. But the law would have to be applied just the same to a case where half a dozen legitimate children had been left a small estate, and a brood of asserted bastards were clamoring for half the patrimony. No doubt illicit sexual relations sometimes impose hardships on innocent persons, but such is the result of all violations of law. The legislature could abolish all distinctions between legitimate and illegitimate children; but if it should do so it would practically abolish marriage, and dethrone chastity as the queen of womanly virtues.

Upon the second branch of the case I have come to the conclusion, after a good deal of doubt, that the letters written by the deceased, and testified to by one of the witnesses as having been written and signed in his presence, constituted a written acknowledgment by him that plaintiff was his illegitimate child, within the meaning of section 1387, and that such acknowledgment makes her his heir. There was some evidence to establish these facts, and therefore the findings of the court below must be taken as true. The argument is very strong that the section contemplates a formal written instrument, made for the express, deliberate purpose of complying with the law, and not a writing made without such present and deliberate intent. But as the language of the section is very broad, and does not, upon its face, present the condition contended for by appellants, I am disposed to consider their construction too narrow. Upon this ground I concur in the judgment. The judgment of the court below proceeds upon the theory that plaintiff was adopted under section 230, but, as the purpose of the action is to determine her heirship, and as the facts which make her an heir under section 1387 are found by the lower court, and as the result is practically the same under either section, I see no objection to affirming the judgment.

De Haven, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice McFarland.

Peckham et al. v. Stewart. (No. 14,291)

Tender—Sufficiency—Vendor and Purchaser—Sufficiency of Title — Deed — Mistake in Grantee's Name.

1. In an action for damages for failure to deliver a deed in accordance with a contract, it appeared that defendant agreed to make a conveyance of some lands to plaintiffs on or before a certain time, provided that plaintiffs should pay the unpaid price, and that plaintiffs, before the expiration of the time, offered, in writing, to pay the balance, and demanded the deed. Held, under Civil Code, § 1496, providing that "the thing to be delivered need not be actually produced upon an offer of performance," that this offer was sufficient to impose upon defendant the obligation to tender the deed.

2. In an action for damages for failure to deliver a deed that would vest in plaintiffs "a good and perfect title," it appeared that the land was formerly owned by one C., who conveyed to K. F. Redmond; that thereafter one K. F. Redman conveyed the land to defendant; and that subsequently, and before the tender by defendant of a deed to plaintiffs, K. F. Redman executed another conveyance of the same property to defendant, in which he recited that he derived his title under the name "Redmond," that his name was erroneously spelled "Redmond" in the conveyance by which he acquired his title, and that he is the identical person to whom such conveyance was in fact made under the name "Redmond." Held, that defendant's title is not "a good and perfect title," such as he was bound to give by his agreement with plaintiffs.

3. St. 1873-74, p. 345, § 1, providing that "any person in whom the title of real estate is vested, who shall afterwards, from any cause, have his or her name changed, shall, in any conveyances of real estate so held, set forth the name in which he or she derives title to said real estate," applies to a married woman who conveys land to which she acquired title before her marriage, or to a man whose name has been changed by law, and who conveys property, the title to which was vested in him before his change of name, and not to a case where the name is erroneously written in the first deed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by one Peckham and others against one Stewart for damages for failure to deliver a deed in accordance with agreement. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Julius Lee and L. D. Holbrook, for appellant. James A. Hall and Cross & Hall, for respondents.

De Haven, J. The defendant entered into a written agreement with plaintiffs by which he agreed to execute to them on or before December 1, 1888, a conveyance of certain described lots which would vest in plaintiffs “a good and perfect title” thereto, provided that plaintiffs should on or before that date pay the sum of $8,675, the balance of the purchase price agreed to be paid for such lots. The plaintiffs paid $1,000 on account of the purchase price at the date of the agreement. This action is to recover damages from defendant for an alleged failure on his part to make to plaintiffs a deed in accordance with the agreement. The plaintiffs recovered judgment for the sum of $1,000, and the defendant appeals. The grounds upon which the defendant relies for a reversal of the judgment are—First, that the complaint does not state a cause of action; and, second, that the evidence shows that he did tender to plaintiffs a deed conveying a perfect title to the lots sold.

1. The plaintiffs were not, under the contract set out in the complaint, entitled to a conveyance of the lots described in the agreement until they first paid, or offered to pay, defendant the balance of the purchase price agreed upon; and, unless the complaint alleges a full performance or offer to perform their part of the contract in this respect, they are not entitled to maintain this action. Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 421, Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. Rep. 280; Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. Rep. 1070; Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656. The law applicable to this branch of the case is stated by Mr. Justice Rhodes, with his usual clearness and accuracy, in delivering the opinion of the court in Hill v. Grigsby, supra, in this language: “In a contract for the sale of real estate, where the purchaser covenants to pay the purchase money, and the vendor covenants to convey the premises at the time of payment, or upon the time of payment of the money, or as soon as it is paid,—and they all mean the same thing,—the covenants are mutual and dependent; and neither can sue without showing a performance, or an offer to perform, on his part, and the performance, or the offer to perform, on the one part is a condition precedent to the right to insist upon a performance on the other part.” The allegation of the complaint upon this point is that plaintiffs did, on August 31, 1888, offer, in writing, to pay the defendant the full purchase price of the lots mentioned in the agreement. The offer is addressed to the defendant, and signed by plaintiffs, and, so far as necessary to be here stated, is as follows: “Please take notice that we, * * * the obligees in a certain bond for a deed * * * made to you by us on the first day of June, 1888, * * * do hereby, in writing, offer to pay to you, the said obligor therein, the sum of $8,675. And we do hereby demand of you that you do forthwith make * * * to us a good and sufficient conveyance of the property mentioned and described in said bond, with the usual covenants, and that you shall give to us a perfect title to said lands, all in accordance with said bond.” It is urged by defendant that this offer was not sufficient to impose upon him the obligation to tender the conveyance, and that it was incumbent upon plaintiffs to actually produce and tender to him the balance of the purchase money, as a condition precedent to their right to maintain this action, and that the complaint is defective because it fails to allege an actual tender of the money to be paid under the contract. In support of this position the case of Englander v Rogers, 41 Cal. 421, is cited. It was held in that case that a simple offer to pay, without an actual tender of the money, was insufficient to put the vendee in a contract of sale in default. The court there said: “To constitute a valid tender in such a case, the party must have the money at hand, immediately under his control, and must then and there not only be ready and willing, but produce and offer, to pay it to the other party, or on the performance by him of the requested condition.” This was the rule of the common law as to what was required in order to make an effectual tender of money, when its production was not dispensed with by some act or declaration of the party entitled to receive it. 2 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 602; Bakeman v. Pooler, 15 Wend. 637. And as there was no statute of this state relating to the subject of tender when Englander v. Rogers, supra, was decided, the common law, furnished the rule of law for the decision of that case. 1 Hitt. Gen. Laws, par. 599. But section 1496 of the Civil Code, since enacted, has changed the common-law rule, which required its actual production in making a tender of money. That section declares: “The thing is to be delivered, if any, need not, in any case, be actually produced upon an offer of performance, unless the offer is accepted.” The written offer of plaintiffs in this case complied with the requirements of this section. They had a right, at the time of making the offer, to demand that defendant perform his part of the contract by delivering the conveyance required by the contract; and until defendant signified his acceptance of their offer to pay, by a tender of such conveyance, plaintiffs were under no obligation to actually produce before him the money mentioned in their written offer. It follows from these views that the demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled.

2. The court found that the defendant’s title to the land which he agreed to convey was defective, and that he did not at the date when he tendered a conveyance thereof to plaintiffs, “or at any time thereafter, or at the time of the trial of this case,” have a perfect title thereto. It is claimed that this finding is against the evidence. It is shown by the statement on motion for a new trial that on October 20, 1876, one Jane Coolidge held the legal title to about two thirds of said land, and that on that day she conveyed the portion thereof owned by her, the name of the grantee in the deed then made by her being given as "K. F. Redmond." On November 17, 1876, one Callahan, who was the owner of the remainder of the land, conveyed the portion owned by him, the name of the grantee in his deed being also given as "K. F. Redmond." So it would seem that on this last-named day the apparent legal title to all the land was in a person bearing the name of "K. F. Redmond." Thereafter one K. F. Redman executed a deed of all the land to defendant, and after this, and before defendant tendered a deed thereof to plaintiffs, said Redman executed another deed of the same land to defendant, in which he recited that he derived title thereto under the name of "K. F. Redmond," that his name was erroneously written "Redmond" in the conveyances which he received from Callahan and Jane Coolidge, and that he is the identical person to whom such conveyances were in fact made under the name of "K. F. Redmond." This is all the evidence on the point, and upon these facts we are of opinion that defendant did not show such a title to the land in question as plaintiffs were bound to accept under their agreement. The apparent legal title was in K F. Redmond, and a deed executed by K. F. Redman was not apparently sufficient to transfer such title. The names were not idem sonans; and, as the purpose of a name is to identify the person to whom it is given, the presumption would be that the names of "Redmond" and "Redman" refer to different persons. McNally v. Mott, 3 Cal. 235. The second deed from Redman, in which he recites that he is the identical person named as "Redmond" in the prior conveyances does not help the matter. These recitals may be true, in point of fact, and upon being established by proof, in a proper action, the defendant could doubtless be able to obtain a judgment reforming the deeds under which his grantor, Redman, claimed, and which judgment would, in effect, give him a "good and perfect title" to the land, within the meaning of the law and the agreement which he made with the plaintiffs. But a good and perfect title is one which is not only good in point of fact, but it must also be apparently perfect when exhibited; that is, free from any reasonable objection. It is not sufficient that it can be shown to be good as the result of an action instituted for the purpose of reforming defects existing in any deed which is necessary to make the chain of title complete. This was so substantially held by this court in the late cases of Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. Rep. 262, and Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 292, 28 Pac. Rep. 1046; and the same rule is declared, also, in Richmond v. Gray, 3 Allen, 25, and Tillotson v. Gesner, 33 N. J. Eq. 327. In holding that the last deed executed to defendant by Redman did not, of itself, cure the apparent defect in defendant's title growing out of the fact that the land was formerly conveyed to Redmond, and not Redman, we have not overlooked the act concerning conveyances, cited by appellant, (St. 1873-74, p. 345,) the first section of which is as follows: "Section 1. Any person in whom the title of real estate is vested, who shall afterwards, from any cause, have his or her name changed, shall, in any conveyances of real estate so held, set forth the name in which he or she derives title to said real estate." This statute evidently was intended for such cases as that of a married woman conveying land to which she acquired title before her marriage, or where a man whose name has been changed by law conveys property, the title to which was vested in him prior to such change of name; but it has no application to a case like this, and cannot, without a very wide departure from its language, be construed as authorizing one who has in fact received a conveyance, but in which his name has been erroneously stated, to correct such mistake by reciting the fact in a subsequent deed. The statute applies only to the cases expressly named in it, and provides for them the same rule for conveyancing always followed before its enactment by those who understood the proper method of transacting such business.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WOODWARD et al. v. RAUM et al. (No. 14,779.)

Partition—Real and Personal Property—Decree.

In an action for partition of real estate, with the buildings and personal property thereon, it is proper to order partition of the real property separate and apart from the personal property, where it does not appear that such course will greatly prejudice the owners.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action for partition by one Woodward and others against one Raum and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John B. Harmon, for appellants. Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon and W. W. Cope, for respondents.

Per Curiam. Appellants commenced this action for partition of the property known as "Woodward's Gardens," consisting of three parcels of land, with the buildings, structures, improvements, art gallery, museums, menagerie of wild animals, and other personal property. The contention of appellants in the court below was, and their contention here is, that the entire property, real and personal, constitutes one piece of property, of which a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners, and therefore a sale of both the real and personal property should be made together. The court, however, found that a partition of said real property, separate and apart from said personal property, might be made without great prejudice to the owners, and decreed accordingly. Is that finding justified by the evidence? We think it is.

There is some conflict in the evidence upon this question, i. e. witnesses differed in opinion as to whether the real estate would bring more if sold without the wild animals and other personal property or not. After a careful reading of the evidence on this question, we are not prepared to say that the evidence even preponderates against the finding of the court below. If it had appeared to that court that a partition could not be made without great prejudice to the owners, a sale might have been ordered. Section 752, Code Civil Proc. But it did not appear to the court below, and does not appear to us, that a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners; and the owners themselves appear to be equally divided upon this question.

Judgment and order affirmed.

HUTCHINSON et al. v. WOODWARD et al.

(No. 14,780.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 11, 1893.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by one Hutchinson and others against one Woodward and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John B. Harmon, for appellants. Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon and W. W. Cope, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for the sale, and partition of the proceeds thereof, of the personal property on the premises known as "Woodward's Gardens." The court decreed a sale and partition as prayed. Appellants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order. The contention of appellants is that the personal property and real estate constituting "Woodward's Gardens" should all be sold together as one piece of property, and the proceeds of such sale be partitioned among the owners. We held in Woodward v. Raum, 31 Pac. Rep. 930, that the real estate might be partitioned among the owners without prejudice to them, and affirmed the judgment of the court below, ordering such a partition to be made.

Judgment and order affirmed.

DIXON v. PLUNS. (No. 14,429.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 11, 1893.)

VERDICT—NEGLIGENCE—NONSUIT.

1. A verdict arrived at by adding together the amounts thought by each juror to be a just verdict, and dividing the sum by 12, will be set aside.

2. While plaintiff was walking on the sidewalk of a public street, an employe of defendant, who was repairing a building overhead, let fall a chisel, which struck plaintiff on the head, inflicting a serious injury. Held, that this established a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendant, and a nonsuit was properly denied. Harrison, J., dissenting.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; EUGENE R. GARBER, Judge.

Action by Katie E. Dixon against William J. F. W. Pluns to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted through the alleged negligence of an employe of defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. C. Firebaugh, for appellant. Nagle & Nagle, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent, while walking upon the sidewalk of Larkin street, in the city of San Francisco, was struck upon the head, and quite seriously injured, by a chisel which fell from a scaffolding above, upon which one of the appellant's employes was standing while engaged in affixing a cornice to the building. Damages were recovered in the lower court, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

Appellant moved for a new trial upon the ground of misconduct of the jury, in this: that they arrived at their verdict by a resort to the determination of chance. The Code expressly provides that such misconduct may be shown by the affidavits of jurors, (section 657, Code Civil Proc.;) and, in support of the motion, appellant presented the affidavit of one Koster, a juror, wherein he stated "that, upon retiring to the jury room, the twelve jurors first agreed by a vote that the average sense of the jurors should control in arriving at what the verdict should be, and then the twelve jurors agreed to be controlled by their vote, and voted that the said average sense of the jurors should be arrived at in the manner following, namely, by each individual juror writing on a piece of paper what he would fix the verdict at, and that the sums so written should then be added together, and the aggregate divided by twelve, and that the amount resulting should be taken as the average sense of the jurors, and be put in the verdict accordingly; and thereupon said plan was carried out," etc. Courts have not been astute in perceiving sufficient error to set aside verdicts upon the grounds here relied upon, and evidence sustaining the verdict has been generally favored; but upon this motion no opposing affidavits were offered, and the merits of the contention rest alone upon the sufficiency of the statement of facts above recited. Reduced to its lowest terms, the affidavit plainly discloses that the verdict was the result of a previous agreement, and was arrived at upon the basis that the amount of the verdict should be the quotient resulting from a division wherein 12 was the divisor, and the sum of the various amounts thought to be a just verdict by the respective jurors the dividend. The calculation was made in pursuance of a prior agreement that the result should be the verdict; and that result was adopted as the verdict, not upon further consideration of the jury, and upon the determination that such amount formed a just and proper verdict, but it was adopted in pursuance of the prior "agreement." The decisions of our courts clearly indicate that they do not countenance such procedure, and the verdict must be set aside. This question is reviewed, and the authorities collated, in the recent case of Improvement Co. v. Adams, (Colo. App.) 28 Pac. Rep. 662, where it is said: "As well put in one case, 'it substitutes the fluctuation and uncertain hazards of the lottery for the deliberative conclusions of their reflections and interchange of views.'" It was said by this court, in Turner v. Water Co., 25 Cal. 397: "To ascertain this average, the jury may properly adopt the method which was used in the present case, but they ought not to agree to be bound by the result, whatever it may be. If they do so agree, and such result is made the verdict without further consideration or assent, such verdict is vicious and irregular, and must be set aside whenever the fact is made to appear by proper and competent evidence." This language is quoted with approval in the recent case of Hunt v. Elliott, 77 Cal. 591, 20 Pac. Rep. 132. In that case it was held that the affidavit of the juror was insufficient in its statement of facts to defeat the verdict. The court failed to specifically indicate wherein the defects existed, and we now are unable to perceive them; but the judgment sustaining the verdict was clearly right upon the second ground stated, and might well have been supported upon that ground alone. As to the affidavit now under consideration, as already suggested, we are satisfied it presents a state of facts that demands a retrial of the case. As the cause must be returned to the lower court for further proceedings, we pass to an examination of some additional matters.

[1] Reversed in banc see 33 P. 268, 98 Cal. 384.

The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. Upon the evidence we cannot say that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in walking upon the sidewalk at the time the injury was inflicted. She had a right to be there, and had no sufficient reason to anticipate danger from overhead. Respondent's evidence also established a prima facie case of negligence upon the part of appellant. Conceding the rules of evidence as between master and servant to be as intimated in Madden v. Steamship Co., 86 Cal. 448, 25 Pac. Rep. 5, still that case is not this case. Respondent was walking upon a public thoroughfare. An employe of appellant, while engaged in repairing a building overhead, let fall a chisel, which inflicted the injury. Those facts constitute a prima facie case, for the presumption of negligence upon the part of the employe flows therefrom, and authorities are ample to support this principle of law. As to common carriers this doctrine is fully discussed and adopted in the case of Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 460, where Chief Justice Sanderson said: "The argument places the burden of explanation upon the shoulders of the plaintiff, but, unfortunately for the argument, the law places it upon the shoulders of the defendant." This case was approved in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 583, 22 Pac. Rep. 266, a case of injury by the falling of an elevator; the court holding that the rule applied to common carriers was equally applicable to the owner of an elevator. It is there said: "In this case the plaintiff was only called on to show that he was hurt by the breaking of the machinery of the elevator, by which he was injured. When this is done, he has made out a case on which, there being no other evidence introduced, he has a right to recover." The application of the principle of presumption of negligence from the facts and circumstances of the accident apply to the present case as entirely and fully as to the preceding citations. No sound reason can be advanced to the contrary. Upon principle there is no distinction. This question is carefully considered, and the authorities reviewed, in Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567. In that case the wall of a building fell upon a traveler in the street. The court held that a presumption of negligence arose from the fact of the building falling. In Lyons v. Rosenthal, 11 Hun, 46, the injury arose from the falling of a box of goods from the story above, and it was held that negligence would be presumed. In support of this doctrine the court cited various English authorities, which upon their facts stand upon common ground with the case at bar. See Kearney v. Railroad Co., L. R. 5 Q. B. 411; Byrne v. Boadle, 2 Hurl. & C. 722; Scott v. Dock Co., 3 Hurl. & C. 596. The true rule recognized by the authorities as pertaining to this class of accidents is: "Where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care." Shear. & R. Neg. § 60. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: Paterson, J.

Harrison, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal upon the first point discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Garoutte. I also concur in holding that the court properly refused a nonsuit. But I do not concur in that portion of the opinion which holds that the liability of the defendant is to be determined by the same rules which determine the liability of common carriers of passengers. Their relation to a passenger is such that, upon the proof of an injury sustained by him while being carried, negligence is presumed, and the burden of exonerating itself from liability is thrown upon the carrier. Bush v. Barnett, (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 2. In the present case, however, there was no contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and as the liability of the defendant is predicated solely upon his negligence, it was essential for the plaintiff to present some evidence tending to establish such negligence before she was entitled to recover. Whart. Neg. § 421. "It is believed that it is never true, except in contractual relations, that the proof of the mere fact that the accident happened to the plaintiff, without more, will amount to evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant." Thomp. Neg. p. 1227. See, also, Cosulich v. Oil Co., 122 N. Y. 123, 25 N. E. Rep. 259; Huff v. Austin, 46 Ohio St. 386, 21 N. E. Rep. 864.

When the plaintiff rested her case she had, however, presented sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant. She was, at the time of receiving the injury, traveling upon the public highway,—a place in which she had the right to be,—and the defendant was engaged in the lawful occupation of constructing a building fronting upon the street. While thus engaged, he was compelled, more or less, to obstruct the free use of the street; but as this obstruction was for his own convenience, and was an interference with the rights of others, it imposed upon him the duty of exercising such care and caution in the performance of his work as would not interfere with the safety of those who had the right to use the street; and any omission on his part to observe this duty was such negligence as would render him liable for any injury resulting therefrom. Inasmuch, therefore, as there was evidence presented by the plaintiff tending to show that the accident to her was caused by the falling of a chisel from the scaffolding of the building, and that the chisel was that of one of the employes of the defendant, who had the control of the construction of the building, there were circumstances before the court which would authorize an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant, and which threw upon him the burden of disproving the same, (Shear. & R. Neg. § 58;) and the court was not authorized to withdraw the determination of this question from the jury.

PEOPLE v. AH LEE DOON. (No. 20,912.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 12, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—RECORD ON APPEAL — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE—DRAWING JURY—CONTINUANCE—EXAMINATION OF JUROR—CHARACTER OF DEFENDANT.

1. A copy of the judge's charge, made from the official reporter's notes, and certified by the county clerk, and which is materially different from the copy in the printed record, is no part of such record, and cannot be used to correct the charge as contained in the bill of exceptions, which has been indorsed and authenticated by the judge.

2. Papers filed as proposed amendments to the record must be disregarded when not embodied in the bill of exceptions.

3. A judge who is disqualified, under Code Civil Proc. § 170, from sitting or acting as such in an action in which he has been attorney, may order and superintend the drawing of the panel of jurors for the term of court by which such action is to be tried, since this is not sitting in the action within the meaning of the statute.

4. Any objection because of such judge ordering the drawing of the panel should be raised by challenging the panel from which the jury was drawn, so that, if the objection had been sustained, a new venire could have issued, and could not be raised for the first time after verdict.

5. Though the order of the governor authorizing a judge to preside over a cause in another county than his own is not issued until two days after he received defendant's plea while acting in such cause, it will be presumed, in the absence of any question raised at the time of entering the plea, that he was then acting under an invitation from the judge of that county, which, under Code Civil Proc. § 71, would give him the same authority as an order from the governor.

6. Defendant, on trial for murder, moved for a continuance on the ground that his chief witness, a Chinaman, was absent in China, and alleged that such witness was the only one who saw the assault on defendant by deceased, in consequence of which defendant afterwards shot deceased, and that such witness' testimony on the trial would be substantially the same as defendant's. It appeared that defendant was informed of the intended departure of the witness, and made no effort to induce him to remain, or to secure his testimony by deposition. Defendant claimed in his affidavit that the witness intended to return, and that he was provided with return papers, but of this he offered no proof. Held, that a refusal to grant a continuance on account of the absence of such witness was not an abuse of discretion.

7. Such refusal could not be based on the ground that the evidence of the witness was merely cumulative.

8. On the examination of a juror on his voir dire it is in the discretion of the court to ask him leading questions, and allow counsel to do so, which discretion, however, must not be abused.

9. It is not error to exclude evidence of the good disposition of defendant, other than his good reputation.

10. On the cross-examination of witnesses testifying to defendant's good disposition it was proper to ask them if they had heard of defendant's prior conviction of murder, and of his having drawn his pistol on different persons.

11. The law taking away the challenge for implied bias on the ground that the juror has formed or expressed an unqualified opinion as to the guilt of the accused is not unconstitutional as taking away one of the essential constituents of the right of jury trial secured by the constitution.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

Ah Lee Doon was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Darwin and Edgar B. Haymond, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., James W. Cochrane, Dist. Atty., and J. N. E. Wilson, for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant, on the 2d day of December, 1890, shot and killed William N. Shenton, at the town of San Rafael, in Marin county. On the 29th of December, 1890, F. M. Angellotti, then district attorney of said county, filed in the superior court an information charging the defendant with the crime of murder, and also charging him with a prior conviction of murder in the first degree, which it was alleged had never been reversed, annulled, or set aside. On the same day the defendant was arraigned before E. B. MAHON, then judge of the superior court of Marin, and was given time to plead until January 5, 1891. On that day F. M. Angellotti, who, as district attorney, had taken the dying declaration of Shenton conducted the preliminary examination of defendant, and filed the information against him, having succeeded E. B. MAHON as judge of the superior court, and, being disqualified to sit or act in the case, (Code Civil Proc. § 170, subd. 3,) extended the defendant's time to plead until January 10th, at which time D. J. MURPHY, one of the judges of the superior court of San Francisco, being president and presiding, the defendant appeared with his counsel, and entered his plea of not guilty. The case was thereupon set for trial on the 19th of January, but was subsequently continued until February 2d, at which date the trial commenced before Judge MURPHY. Between the date of defendant's plea and the commencement of his trial one or more orders continuing the cause from day to day were made by Judge ANGELLOTTI. On January 10th—the date of defendant's plea—Judge ANGELLOTTI made an order directing the clerk to draw 50 jurors, and the sheriff to summon them for January 19th, the day for which defendant's trial was set. Judge ANGELLOTTI presided at the drawing of said 50 jurors, and from the panel so obtained the jury which tried the defendant was selected, no challenge or objection to the panel having been at any time interposed by or on behalf of the defendant. When the cause was called for trial on February 2d the defendant moved for a continuance on the ground of the absence of a material witness. His motion was overruled, and the trial proceeded, resulting in his conviction of murder in the first degree, and sentence of death. Before sentence he moved for a new trial, which was denied, from which order and the judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

The errors assigned in support of the appeal are numerous, and only partly indicated by the foregoing statement, which, however, is sufficient to exhibit the case in its general outlines. Other material facts will be stated in connection with the points to which they more particularly relate.

It is proper at the outset to say that the attempted amendments or additions to the record, filed by the people and by the defendant respectively, must be wholly disregarded. The paper filed by the attorney general on the part of the people consists of a copy of the judge's charge to the jury, certified by the county clerk, which, it is said, differs materially from that contained in the printed record. But the copy contained in the printed record, or one of them, (for it appears in two places,) is embraced in the bill of exceptions settled and allowed by the judge who presided at the trial, while the copy certified by the clerk seems to be a longhand transcript of the official reporter's notes of the charge, filed with the clerk, but never indorsed or authenticated by the judge. Such a document is no part of the record, (People v. January, 77 Cal. 179, 19 Pac. Rep. 258,) and cannot, of course, be used to correct the bill of exceptions, which is a part of the record. The paper filed by the defendant consists of copies, certified by the private secretary of the governor, of certain correspondence between Judge ANGELLOTTI and the clerk of Marin county on one side, and the governor on the other, relating to the designation of Judge MURPHY to preside in the superior court of Marin county for the trial of defendant and others whose prosecution for criminal offenses had been commenced by Judge ANGELLOTTI while district attorney. The facts shown by this proposed amendment appear to be wholly immaterial, but if they were otherwise they could not be considered. To make them part of the record they should have been embodied in the bill of exceptions. Looking, then, exclusively to the duly certified record of the case contained in the printed transcript, I proceed to consider the matters assigned as error.

1. It is contended that Judge ANGELLOTTI, being disqualified to sit or act in the case, had no power or jurisdiction to order the drawing of the panel of jurors for the session of the court at which the defendant was to be tried, and especially that he was incompetent to preside at the drawing of such jurors. Section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "No justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding (1) to which he is a party, or in which he is interested; (2) when he is related to either party by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, computed according to the rules of law; (3) when he has been attorney or counsel for either party in the action or proceeding. But the provisions of this section shall not apply to the arrangement of the calendar, or the regulation of the order of business, nor in the power of transferring the action or proceeding to some other court." It is perfectly clear from the terms of this section, without reference to the numerous cases in which its provisions have been applied and enforced, that Judge ANGELLOTTI was disqualified by the third subdivision from sitting or acting in this cause, except for the purpose of making the merely formal orders enumerated in the last clause of the section, and it is well settled that so far as he may have done so his acts were void. The question, therefore, is whether, in ordering and superintending the drawing of the panel of jurors, he did sit or act in this cause. It does not appear that the jury was drawn specially for this case, and presumably it was the regular jury for the ensuing term or session of the court which it is made the duty of the presiding judge to have drawn and summoned. Code Civil Proc. § 214. To draw such jury was not a proceeding in this cause, or in any cause, and could not possibly have been a void act merely because this cause, and possibly others in which Judge ANGELLOTTI was disqualified, was coming on for trial. The fault, if fault there was, consisted in selecting the jury which tried this cause from the panel so drawn. But if the jurors drawn and summoned in pursuance of Judge ANGELLOTTI's order were incompetent to try this cause, the objection should have been taken by a challenge to the panel, and if, for the purposes of this cause, the act of the judge in ordering the jurors drawn was void, as counsel contend, then certainly the statute (Pen. Code, § 1059) is broad enough to have given the defendant good grounds of challenge to the panel; and that was the regular and only way to raise the objection. If it had been made at that time, and sustained, a special venire could at once have been issued. Raised for the first time after verdict, it comes too late.

2. It is objected that Judge MURPHY had no authority to act in the cause on January 10th when he received the defendant's plea. It is certainly true that the order of the governor, issued on January 12th, conferred no authority to act on the 10th. But Judge MURPHY may have been, and probably was, presiding on the 10th by invitation of Judge ANGELLOTTI. Such invitation would have conferred the requisite authority. Const. art. 6, § 8; Code Civil Proc. § 71.[1] No question as to Judge MURPHY'S authority was raised at the time of entering the plea, and it must be presumed that he was lawfully exercising jurisdiction. Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subds. 14-16.

3. It is claimed that the court erred in denying defendant's application for a postponement of the trial. The evidence adduced at the trial showed that while Shenton was driving slowly along the street defendant approached him from behind, ad fired several shots at him. The first shot missed, the second took effect, the bullet striking Shenton in the back, inflicting a mortal wound, and bringing him helpless to the ground. A third and fourth shot were fired after Shenton fell, but whether directed at him or not is perhaps not clear. It was, at all events, however, highly material to the defense to show what provocation led to the shooting. According to the testimony of the defendant, he had been wantonly assaulted, beaten, and kicked by Shenton a few minutes before the shooting. According to the dying declaration of Shenton, a quarrel had taken place, in which blows had been exchanged, but the quarrel was provoked by the abusive, insulting, and aggressive conduct of the defendant. The only witness present when this quarrel took place was a Chinaman, named Lee Ching. The affidavit filed by defendant in support of his motion for a continuance showed that Lee Ching would testify to the same version of this quarrel and assault that the defendant gave. It is not denied that his evidence would have been material, but the attorney general contends that, as it would have been merely cumulative to that of the defendant, the absence of the witness was not a ground for a continuance. It is true that a trial will not be postponed ordinarily for the purpose of obtaining cumulative evidence, but this rule, which is by no means absolute, has no application to a case in which the only evidence at hand is that of an interested party, especially when he is defendant under an indictment for murder. The ruling of the court against a continuance cannot be sustained on the ground that the evidence was cumulative. But thre was another ground upon which the ruling may have been made, and which is sufficient to sustain it. According to the defendant's affidavit, Lee Ching had sailed for China on December 6th, promising to return in September or October following, and provided with papers which secured him the right to return. But upon this point—the right of Lee Ching to return and re-enter the United States—it was clear that the defendant could have no direct knowledge of the facts, and he neither stated the facts nor the sources or means of his information. The court may well have found that there was no probability that Lee Ching would ever return within its jurisdiction. No effort appeared to have been made to induce him to remain, although the defendant was informed of his intended departure, and knew that his trial was impending, and no steps were ever taken to secure his testimony by deposition. Under the circumstances, the court may have been satisfied that his testimony was not really desired, and that his absence was used as a pretext for delay. In passing upon the motion for a new trial the court was probably influenced with respect to this matter, and largely justified by the fact that Shenton's dying declaration was directly opposed to the defendant's testimony, not only as to the circumstances of the shooting, but as to the previous quarrel and assault, and that several disinterested witnesses of the shooting fully corroborated the dying statement, and as clearly contradicted the defendant's testimony. The fact that the defendant was proved to have given an untruthful account of the shooting and the circumstances attending it, while the dying declaration was corroborated in those particulars by a number of disinterested witnesses, may have satisfied the judge that the defendant had no real desire to call a disinterested witness of the preceding quarrel. At all events, we cannot say that the refusal of the continuance was, in view of all the circumstances, an abuse of discretion.

4. Two jurors were challenged for actual bias,—one because he had formed and expressed an opinion that the defendant was guilty, (an opinion based upon newspaper reports and common rumor;) the other, apparently, because he had a low opinion of the value of Chinese testimony. In the course of the examination of these jurors upon their voir dire a number of questions were asked them by counsel for the prosecution and by the court, which were objected to as leading. The questions certainly were leading, but such a course of examination is in the discretion of the court, and we cannot see that it was abused in this instance.

5. The information contained a charge of prior conviction of murder, and alleged that it had not been reversed, annulled, or set aside. It is contended that this was error, but how it was error is not stated, and does not occur to us. It was an error on the part of the district attorney to allege that the conviction was in force, for it appeared by the evidence at the trial that the offense had been pardoned, but the court committed no error in any ruling concerning this matter. The only thing done by the court was to permit the prosecution, with the consent of the defendant, to withdraw that part of the charge.

6. It would not have been error if the court had excluded evidence of the good disposition of the defendant other than evidence of his good reputation; but, as matter of fact, the record shows that the objection of the prosecution to this evidence was withdrawn, and it was thereupon admitted.

7. On cross-examination of the witnesses

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 71, provides: "A judge of any superior court may hold the superior court in any county, at the request of the judge or judges of the superior court thereof, and, upon the request of the governor, it shall be his duty to do so; and in either case the judge holding the court shall have the same power as a judge thereof."

who testified to the good disposition of the defendant, the court permitted them to be asked if they had heard of his prior conviction of murder, and of his having drawn his pistol on different persons. In the cross-examination of witnesses testifying to reputation or character, such questions are permissible.

8. The charge of the court was very long, and a large number of special instructions were asked by the defendant, many of which were refused. It is contended that the court erred in refusing each one of eleven different instructions asked by the defendant, and that many parts of the charge of the court were erroneous. After a careful examination of the charge and the instructions refused, I find that the instructions refused are all embraced in the charge, and I find no error in the charge of which the defendant can complain. If it is erroneous at all, it is in stating the law more favorably to the defendant on one or two points than he had a right to ask.

9. In addition to the foregoing points, counsel for defendant have called in question the constitutionality of the law taking away the challenge for implied bias, on the ground that the juror has formed or expressed an unqualified opinion as to the guilt of the accused. Their contention is that one of the essential constituents of the right of trial by jury, secured by the constitution, is the right of a person accused of a crime to be tried by jurors who have never formed or expressed an unqualified opinion of his guilt, whether founded on newspaper reports, or common rumor, or upon grounds more reliable. After carefully considering the argument of counsel and the cases cited, I am satisfied that the weight of authority is against their contention, and that there is nothing to warrant us in pronouncing unconstitutional a statute which has been in unquestioned operation nearly 18 years. The judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

Execution—Sheriff's Deed—Limitation of Actions—Outstanding Title in Ejectment.

1. Where land is sold under execution in an attachment suit, the sheriff's deed takes effect as of the date of the levy of the attachment, and a conveyance by the attachment debtor after the attachment was levied, and before judgment, vests no title in his grantee.

2. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against the purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale, or his grantees, until delivery of the sheriff's deed. Leonard v. Flynn, 26 Pac. Rep. 1097, 89 Cal. 536, followed.

3. Where the defense of outstanding title in a third person is made to an action of ejectment, it is essential to show that the title was outstanding at the time of trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county, John Reynolds, Judge.

Ejectment by C. P. Robinson against R. S. Thornton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant Thornton appeals. Affirmed.

Edwd. F. Fitzpatrick, for appellant. T. M. Osmont and D. M. Delmas, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This is an appeal by defendant Thornton from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial in an action of ejectment. Plaintiff founds his title upon an attachment, judgment, and sale on execution thereunder, in an action entitled McCombe v. Benjamin S. Green and Hannah Green, his wife, commenced April 1, 1872, the attachment being levied upon the realty the following day. Judgment was rendered for McCombe November 5, 1880, and the lands were sold under execution thereon December 10, 1881, to one Forbes, and certificate of sale issued to him upon the same day. Upon the 4th day of June, 1887, the ex-sheriff of San Mateo county, who made the sale, executed a deed of the premises to respondent, who held the certificate as an assignee thereof. This action was commenced June 8, 1887. Appellant, as appears by his evidence, relies upon three defenses to defeat respondent's cause of action: (1) Title under a deed from said Green, dated August 17, 1872; (2) title by adverse possession, based upon an entry made under the aforesaid deed; and, (3) outstanding title in a stranger.

1. A sheriff's deed takes effect from the date of the levy of the attachment, if the levy is such as to create a lien. Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165. Upon an examination of the evidence we are satisfied that a valid levy was made; and it follows that respondent's title, under his deed of June 4, 1887, took effect as of the date of the attachment, to wit, April 2, 1872, and that appellant's deed from Green, dated August 17, 1872, carried no title.

2. Appellant failed to acquire title, as against Robinson, by adverse possession. Robinson had no right of entry, and therefore no cause of action, until he received the sheriff's deed, and his complaint was filed within a short time subsequent to that event. The statute of limitations did not begin to run against him until his right of entry accrued. In Jefferson v. Wendt, 51 Cal. 573, this doctrine was declared; and, upon the ground that it had established a rule of property, it was followed in Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 536, 26 Pac. Rep. 1097. The adjudications of the courts of Illinois declare the statute of limitations in this character of action to begin to run from the date when the purchaser at the execution sale is entitled to his deed, and not, as in this state, from the date of the actual delivery thereof. This view was taken in Pratt v. Pratt, 96 U. S. 704, and seems to have sound reason in its support, but the rule is to the contrary in this state. It must be remembered that this appellant did not enter upon the land with bow and spear, defying the world. He entered under a deed from Green, the judgment debtor, and, in effect, respondent's grantor, and is now claiming color of title under such deed. Respondent had no right of entry during these years that appellant was in possession; neither did Green, respondent's grantor, for whatever interest he possessed he conveyed by deed to appellant. Hence there was no right of entry in any one, and therefore there was no person entitled to oust appellant. It would be a novel principle to declare a title by adverse possession against the respondent, holding a perfect legal title, when neither he, his predecessors nor grantors, were entitled to bring an action to recover possession of the realty during the period of incubation of this new title. The principle upon which the statute of limitations is founded is the laches of the true owner in sleeping upon his rights, but there can be no laches when there are no rights to be protected. It was said by Mr. Justice Miller in Pratt v. Pratt, 96 U. S. 707: "The defendant, having purchased the land of the person who had the legal title, does undoubtedly hold adversely to everybody else. He admits no better right in any one. He is no man's tenant. The right by which he holds possession is superior to the rights of all others. He asserts this, and he acts on it. His possession is, in this sense, adverse to the whole world. But it is not inconsistent with all this that there exists a lien on the land, —a lien which does not interfere with his possession, which cannot disturb it, but which may ripen into a title superior to that under which he holds, but which is yet in privity with it. In the just sense of the term his possession is not adverse to this lien. There can be no adversary rights in regard to the possession under the lien, and under the defendant's purchase from the judgment debtor, until the lien is converted into a title conferring the right of possession. The defendant's possession after this is adverse to the title of plaintiff; and then, with the right of entry in plaintiff, the bar of the statute begins to run."

3. For the purpose of showing outstanding title, appellant proved that the common grantor, Green, had mortgaged the premises to certain parties, who had foreclosed the mortgage, and sold the realty under such foreclosure, prior to the date of the McCombe attachment, and that one Ford was the owner of such title at the inception of this action. In rebuttal, respondent introduced a deed showing that whatever title Ford may have had at the commencement of the action was then vested in him. The admission of this evidence was clearly correct. It was not offered for the purpose of showing title in respondent, but to rebut the fact that any outstanding title then vested in Ford. The appellant in no manner connected himself with Ford's title, and under such circumstances the defense of outstanding title is overcome by proof that since the beginning of the action such title has ceased to exist. An outstanding title sufficient to defeat plaintiff in ejectment must be outstanding at the time of the trial of the action. Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, § 831. Appellant insists that he connected himself with Ford's title "by acquiring it by adverse possession." Adverse possession for the statutory period creates a title, but does not operate to transfer the title of the disseisee to the disseisor. Williams v. Sutton, 43 Cal. 65; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 608, 14 Pac. Rep. 379. If respondent had received a deed of this realty from Green at the date of the levy of the McCombe attachment,—except as to the statute of limitations,—he would have been in a position to have successfully prosecuted this action to final judgment, upon the facts as they appear by the record. The final result of the attachment proceedings was a deed to respondent, vesting in him all the title to this realty that Green had at the date of the levy. Such being the fact, respondent must prevail, for the defense of the statute of limitations cannot be maintained.

Respondent's deed from the ex-sheriff, taken in connection with the proceedings in the action of McCombe v Green et al., upon which the deed was based, made a prima facie case of title in his favor; and as we have already seen, that prima facie case is too strong to be repelled to any attack that can be launched against it by the defenses which are used by appellant for that purpose. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re ARGUELLO'S ESTATE. (No. 19,116.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1892.)

ADMINISTRATORS—DEPOSITS IN BANK — PERSONAL LIABILITY.

1. Where an administrator deposits to his own credit, in a bank, funds of the estate, without any designation of his representative capacity, and afterwards the bank fails, he is personally liable for the loss, regardless of care or prudence, even though he has no other money in such bank.

2. Such liability is not affected by Civil Code, § 2236, which provides that "a trustee who willfully and unnecessarily mingles the trust property with his own, so as to constitute himself in appearance its absolute owner, is liable for its safety in all events."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Proceeding for an order to compel the administrator of the estate of Luis Antonio Arguello, deceased, to pay over to creditors funds in his hands belonging to the estate. So ordered. The administrator appeals. Affirmed.

Hendrick & Younkin, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an appeal by the administrator of the estate of the decedent from an order of the superior court of San Diego county, requiring him to pay to the creditors of the estate, whose claims had been duly presented and allowed, certain sums of money. The sum of money in controversy was $4,846.80, which was received by the administrator, for and on account of the estate, between July 5, 1891, and October 15, 1891, and deposited by him in the California Savings Bank in the city of San Diego in his own name. The court below found the facts to be as follows: "That, at the time said funds were deposited by said administrator in said California Savings Bank, said bank was reputed to be, and was considered, a safe and solvent bank and place of deposit, and was of good credit and standing, and was believed by said administrator to be solvent and safe; that said deposit was made in the individual name" of the administrator, "without any designation or indication of his representative capacity, but said administrator had no other funds or account with said bank, and deposited such with that particular bank for the express purpose of keeping the same separate from, and so that it would not be unnecessarily mingled with, his own property or individual funds; that in depositing said funds in said California Savings Bank, as aforesaid, said administrator acted in good faith; that on the 12th day of November, 1891, said California Savings Bank became suddenly, unexpectedly, and wholly insolvent, suspended business, and has not been able to pay the amount so deposited by said administrator with it, or any part thereof; * * * that said administrator has been guilty of no negligence or want of care in the administration of said estate, except that he deposited such funds in the California Savings Bank in his individual name instead of in his representative capacity or in the name of the estate." And as conclusions of law the court found that the administrator was responsible for the money so deposited by him, and that he must pay it over to the creditors of the estate.

The appellant contends that an administrator is only required to act in good faith, and to exercise such skill, prudence, and diligence in managing the affairs of the estate as men ordinarily bestow upon their own affairs; and that when he has in good faith, and with reasonable care, deposited funds of the estate in bank, which have been subsequently lost by the failure of the bank, he will not be held liable for the loss, unless he has willfully and unnecessarily mingled the trust property with his own, so as to constitute himself in appearance its absolute owner; and hence that, under the facts found in this case, the order of the court was erroneous, and should be reversed. The question presented has many times been before the courts of England and of this country, and the decisions upon it have been practically unanimous, and to the same effect as the decision of the court below in this case. The law upon the subject is stated in Perry on Trusts, (section 443:) "A trustee may deposit money temporarily in some responsible bank or banking house; and if he acted in good faith and with discretion, and deposited the money to a trust account, he will not be liable for its loss; * * * but he will be liable for the money in case of a failure of the bank, or for its depreciation, if he deposits it to his own credit, and not to the separate account of the trust estate." And again, in section 463: "So, if the trustee pays the money into a bank in his own name, and not in the name of the trust, he will be responsible for the money in case of the failure of the bank." A reference to a few of the numerous cases cited will be sufficient. In Com. v. McAlister, 28 Pa. St. 480, an administrator had deposited in his own name funds of the estate in a savings bank, and they had been partly lost by a failure of the bank. The court, after stating the facts and reviewing the authorities, said: "But it is sufficient, for the present case, to say that where an administrator or trustee, with trust funds in his hands, deposits them in his own name in a bank or other institution which fails, the loss shall fall upon him; and his liability will not depend upon the good faith, prudence, or judgment with which, apparently, he may have acted, nor upon the fact that he may have disposed of his own funds in the same way." In Williams v. Williams, 55 Wis. 300, 12 N. W. Rep. 465, and 13 N. W. Rep. 274, the plaintiff had in his possession as administrator a sum of money, and for safe-keeping, and greater security and convenience, deposited the same in a bank, taking a certificate of deposit in his own name for the amount. The bank was at the time in good credit and repute as safe, solvent, and in all respects trustworthy; and in making the deposit the administrator informed the teller, who received the money and gave the certificate, that the moneys were trust funds, and did not belong to him individually, but did not inform him to whom the money did in fact belong, nor give any directions as to the deposit being made or the certificate issued in any other than his individual name. Subsequently the bank failed, and the certificate became worthless and the amount wholly lost, except a small dividend was made from the assets in the hands of a receiver. It was held, after a quite lengthy review of the authorities, that the administrator must bear the loss. The court said: "To hold the administrator answerable in this case is undoubtedly a great hardship; but to exonerate him from liability is to encourage the mismanagement of trust funds, and to open the doors to frauds innumerable against those whose age and weakness entitle them to the most rigid protection of the law. The rule, therefore, should not be slackened, even if the question were a new one, much less in view of the authorities cited." In Naltner v. Dolan, 108 Ind. 500, 8 N. E. Rep. 289, attorneys had collected money for a client, and deposited it in a bank which was then in good standing, in their own name, but not mingled with their own money. The bank afterwards failed, and the money was mostly lost. It was held that the attorneys must bear the loss. The court said: "In case it becomes the duty of an agent or trustee to deposit money belonging to his principal, he can escape the risk only by making the deposit in his principal's name, or by so distinguishing it on the books of the bank as to indicate in some way that it is the principal's money. If he deposit in his own name he will not, in case of loss, be permitted to throw such loss on his principal, [citing cases.] In such case the good faith or intention of the trustee is in no way involved. Having for his personal convenience, or from whatever motive, deposited the money in his own name, thereby vesting himself with a legal title, it follows as a necessary consequence, when a loss occurs, he will not be permitted to say, as against the cestui que trust, that the fact is not as he voluntarily made it appear. * * * Whatever diversity of opinion may be found in respect to the rights of the bank or other creditors of the depositor, the authorities agree that a trustee who either invests or deposits trust money in his own name, without in some way designating it as trust property, will be responsible for any loss that may occur to the fund while so invested or deposited." But, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, appellant insists that the rule in this state is declared in section 2236 of the Civil Code, and that that does not make him liable. The section referred to reads as follows: "A trustee who willfully and unnecessarily mingles the trust property with his own, so as to constitute himself in appearance its absolute owner, is liable for its safety in all events." We do not think this section was intended to change the rule generally prevailing, or to limit liability under it; on the contrary, the section seems to be in entire accord with the general rule, and in effect to declare it in unmistakable terms. In our opinion the order appealed from should be affirmed.

KING et al. v. SHEWARD. (No. 19,042.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1893.)

SALE OF GOODS—RETURN OF PORTION—CONDITIONS.

In an action to recover a balance due on account of goods sold, it appeared that a correspondence relating to the right of defendant to return a portion of the goods purchased by him was concluded by a letter from plaintiffs stating that "you may return the goods with the long pants, and we will handle them the best we can for you, and will credit you with whatever we can get for them;" and that defendant immediately returned the goods, with a letter stating that "we send you to-day, per freight, 151 suits, bill inclosed, as per letter of instructions." Held, that a judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the loss on a resale of the goods was proper, though the letter accompanying the bill of the goods returned was written by a clerk without authority.

Action by Henry W. King and others against J. T. Sheward to recover a balance due on an account for goods sold and delivered. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. Burdett, for appellant. J. L. Murphey, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. In this cause the learned judge of the trial court rendered the following opinion:

"The plaintiffs are a clothing house in Chicago, and the action is for a balance due on a claim for goods sold and delivered to the defendant. The main item of difference about which the contention in this suit is, arises from a loss on the return of some of the goods. The defendant ordered the goods by a letter to a Mr. Cook, who was acting for the plaintiffs, the Chicago house, asking him to send not to exceed $2,000 worth of boys' and children's clothing, and adds: 'I want the privilege of returning anything I want to, but if you take proper care I will not return anything, in all probability.' Mr. Cook turned this letter over to the plaintiffs, the Chicago house, and they shipped the lot of goods to fill the order, and on January 5, 1889, Mr. Cook sent the defendant a letter in which he says: 'I am sending you a little over $2,000, so you can return anything you think will not suit your market.' The evidence shows that the plaintiffs sent goods to the value of $476.62 more than Mr. Sheward's letter called for, and the bill accompanying the goods contained the following statement: 'We will allow no goods to be returned after ten days from their receipt.'

"Mr. Cook testifies that the first time they were notified that Mr. Sheward found fault with the goods was his letter of May 8, 1889, in which he states that Mr. Fitzackerly had discovered, in going through the stock, that they did not need the long-pant suits, and asked the privilege of returning them, he paying the freight charges and getting other goods in place thereof, and asking Cook to wire him if he would consent. Cook turned this letter over to the house, and the plaintiffs at once telegraphed Mr. Sheward, on the same day, the 15th of May, and wrote Mr. Sheward, refusing to permit him to return the goods. May 15th, after receiving the telegram from the plaintiffs, Mr. Sheward writes another letter, in which he says he had not handled boys' clothing enough to find out he had made a mistake, 'and I ask you to help me out.' On May 22, 1889, plaintiffs wrote another letter to the defendant in answer to his letter of May 15th to Cook, in which they again refused to receive the goods, and used the following language: 'If you had on receipt of the goods, within a reasonable time thereafter, advised us, we should willingly have received them from you;' and adding: 'We will, however, say this to you: You may return the goods with the long pants, and we will handle them the best we can for you, and will credit you with whatever we can get for them.' Immediately upon the receipt of this letter by the defendant, and on the 29th of May, 1889, he packed up 151 suits and shipped them to the plaintiffs, the Chicago house, and sends the bill with a letter as follows: 'We send you to-day per freight 151 suits, bill inclosed, as per letter of instruction May 22d. Yours, truly, J. T. SHEWARD. Per L.'

"The bill shows that sixteen lots were returned, giving the numbers of each lot, which corresponded with the same numbers in the plaintiffs' first bill to said Sheward, but the return bill shows that ten of these lots were broken by forty-one suits. The defendant, it is true, says that his bookkeeper who signs this letter accompanying the return bill had no authority for writing it, still he was in the employ of the defendant, instructed to make out the bill and send the same, and it was in the line of his business to accompany it with a letter; and, from the fact that the goods were sent after the letter received from the plaintiffs, they would be sent in pursuance to their instruction, whether it said so in the letter or not. In other words, as I view the case, this letter of instruction, as it is called, or letter by the plaintiffs giving the conditions on which they would receive the goods returned, disposes of this case. The defendant had his option whether to return them according to the terms proposed in that letter, or to retain them, and recoup for damages if they were not the kind of goods ordered. He saw proper, however, to accept the terms proposed by the plaintiffs, and returned the goods. The plaintiffs accordingly received the goods so returned, and sold them, as they said they would do, at the best prices. The goods were billed at the price of $882 when returned, and they were sold by the plaintiffs for $600, making a difference of $282. This, with the item of freight and a small error, makes the amount for which the suit is brought. There was much testimony in the case, and much of the argument of counsel in their briefs, which, under the view I take of the matter, cuts no figure. It was in the nature of a new contract or proposition on the part of the plaintiffs to receive back the goods on certain conditions, and the defendant accepted that proposition, and that is the end of the matter, whether it is a hardship or not. Judgment must go for the plaintiffs."

For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and order be affirmed.

BOYD v. BOYD. (No. 19,046.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

DIVORCE—DIVISION OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

In an action for a divorce it is not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to set off to plaintiff the homestead and a small amount of personalty from the community property, leaving to defendant all other community property; section 146, subd. 1, Civil Code, providing: "* * * The community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportion as the court, from all the facts of the case and the condition of the parties, may deem just."

Action for divorce by S. J. Boyd against E. H. Boyd. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Carlton, for appellant. Holloway & Kendrick, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This appeal was taken from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order refusing a new trial. The appeal from the order has been dismissed by the appellate tribunal, and the matter now stands on an appeal from the judgment alone. This appeal was not taken within 60 days from the rendition of the judgment, so that no exception to the decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence can be considered. The findings must therefore be held to be supported by the evidence. The appellant contends, however, that the findings are insufficient. The findings are general, viz.: That all the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are true; that all the allegations of the answer of the defendant, and of the averments thereto, are untrue and false, except the admissions contained in allegations 1 and 2, viz. that the parties were married as alleged in the complaint, and are husband and wife; and that the issue of said marriage was correctly stated in that pleading. Such findings have often been held to be sufficient. Richards v. Shear, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. Rep. 607.

It is further claimed by the defendant and appellant that the court abused its discretion in awarding property to the plaintiff. The decree, which follows the findings and conclusions of law, does not show such to be the fact, and we have nothing to do with the evidence in the case. The court seems, by the decree, to have set aside to the plaintiff, "the innocent party," the homestead taken from the community property, which is subject to a mortgage of $5,000, and a small amount of personal property, leaving to the defendant all other property heretofore owned by the parties as community. This is in accordance with the legal power of the trial court in a proper case, under section 146 of the Civil Code, subds. 1 and 2.[1]

As to the other questions discussed by the appellant, it is sufficient to say that by the dismissal of the appeal from the order denying a new trial they are not before the appellate court for consideration. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

I concur: VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed; and, it appearing to the court that this appeal is without any merit whatever, and has been prosecuted for delay, it is ordered that to the judgment against defendant be added the sum of $100 costs.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. (No. 20,947.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

LARCENY—PRESUMPTION AS TO OWNERSHIP—INDICTMENT.

1. On a trial for larceny from the person, the presumption of law is that the property belonged to him from whose possession it was taken.

2. The owner of the article stolen need not be produced as a witness for the state, if the felonious taking can be established by other competent evidence.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 484, which defines "larceny" as "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another," the indictment or information need not allege the taking to be against the will of the owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Charles D. Davis was convicted of larceny, and appealed. Affirmed.

W. W. Holcomb, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon a careful examination of the instructions of the court, given to the jury, we have no fault to find with them.

It is insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. Davis was charged with stealing a pocketbook and one five-dollar gold piece, all of said property being of the value of six dollars; and it was further charged to be the property of Jane Doe, and taken from her person. Doe was not present at the trial, neither was her testimony before the jury, in any form. It is now claimed that no evidence was introduced showing that the property alleged to have been stolen was her property, or that it was taken against her will. The evidence of eyewitnesses showed that the pocketbook was taken from the woman by appellant while she was standing up in a crowded street car, and the manner of the taking strongly indicates the act of a professional pickpocket. The fact that the property was in the possession of Jane Doe at the time of the taking is sufficient evidence of the ownership in her. It was said in People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 82: "The money was in the possession of Ah Chung, and was taken from his person by the defendants. Therefore, it was presumptively his property, and that was sufficient proof of ownership." Under the Penal Code[1] of this state, it is not necessary to allege in the indictment or information that the property was taken against the will of the owner. There is nothing found in the definition of "larceny" to that effect. Bish. Crim. Proc. § 752*a*, says: "But such consent is, at the common law, matter simply of defense, and the absence of it does not enter into a prima facie case. Hence nonconsent is not averred in the indictment, and it need not be proved." In the state of Texas, nonconsent is made by statute a material element in the definition of "larceny," yet in that state the courts hold that such fact may be proven by circumstantial evidence; and there can be no question but that in many cases the mere act of taking is of such character that nonconsent would follow as an irresistible conclusion.

[1] Section 146, subd. 1, Civil Code, provides: "* * * The community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportion as the court, from the facts of the case and the conditions of the parties, may deem just."

[1] Pen. Code, § 484, defines "larceny" as "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another."

The affidavits offered of newly-discovered evidence are wholly insufficient to justify the granting of the motion for a new trial. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

CHRISTY v. SPRING VALLEY WATERWORKS. (No. 14,388.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1892.)

Partition—Res Judicata—Adverse Possession—Statute of Limitations.

1. A judgment in partition is conclusive of the rights of the parties in the land sought to be partitioned, and a defendant who failed to assert a claim at the trial will be precluded from afterwards asserting it.

2. A deed executed to a defendant in partition, by his codefendants, to certain land sought to be partitioned, while the proceeding is pending, cannot avail such defendant in acquiring a prescriptive title to the land so conveyed against a plaintiff in the partition proceedings.

3. Nor can the payment of taxes by defendant on land while it is held in cotenancy with plaintiff operate to strengthen a title by adverse possession against plaintiff.

4. Code Civil Proc. § 322, provides that when it appears that the occupant entered into the possession of the property under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, or of some part of the property, under such claim for five years, the property so included is deemed to have been held adversely. Held, that the mere fact that defendant had deeds to some of the land sought to be partitioned would not establish an adverse holding by it; it being essential for defendant to show that it entered into possession under such deeds.

5. If there was error in the exclusion of tax receipts offered in evidence by defendant to prove that it had paid taxes on certain land, such error was cured by the testimony of a witness that defendant had paid the taxes.

6. Code Civil Proc. § 765, provides that referees in a partition suit must report their proceedings to the court, describing the property divided and the shares allotted to each party, with a particular description of each share. Section 766 provides that the judgment of the court confirming such report shall be final and conclusive on all persons named as parties to the action, and their legal representatives, who have at the time any interest in the property divided or any part thereof. Held that, until the final judgment confirming the referee's report was rendered, it could not be known to which of the parties any particular parcel of the land would fall, and until such segregation had been made there could be no adverse holding of any portion of the land by either party to the action against any of the other parties thereto; and while a suit in partition was pending, the statute of limitations could not run against or in favor of either of them.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Ejectment by Christy against the Spring Valley Waterworks. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fox, Kellogg & King, for appellant. I. N. Thorne and Oliver P. Evans, for respondent.

Harrison, J. This cause has been before the court on two former occasions. 68 Cal. 73, 8 Pac. Rep. 849; 84 Cal. 541, 24 Pac. Rep. 307. The action is ejectment, and the plaintiff's title is derived from one Randall, to whom the land in question was allotted in an action of partition entitled Randall vs. Winter, brought by him against his cotenants in the late twelfth district court, and in which the appellant herein was one of the defendants. The interlocutory decree in that action was rendered October 13, 1871, and the referee who was appointed under its provisions to make partition of the land involved in the action made his report to the court August 2, 1875, and a final decree, affirming this report and awarding the lands in controversy herein to Randall, was rendered December 23, 1875. The plaintiff herein succeeded to the rights of Randall in the land so allotted to him August 23, 1880, and on the 5th of October, 1880, commenced the present action. The defendant in its answer denied the title of the plaintiff, pleaded the statute of limitations, and also alleged ownership in itself. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from that, and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The interlocutory decree in the partition suit of Randall vs. Winter established the relative rights of the parties thereto in the tract of land sought to be partitioned, and the final judgment therein confirming the report of the referee in partition was a conclusive determination that, as against all of the defendants in that action, Randall was the owner in fee of the tract of land described in the complaint herein. If the defendant herein had any right or claim to this land, it was incumbent on it to assert such right or claim in that action, and a failure to do so would preclude it from subsequently asserting such claim. As was said upon the former appeal in this action, (68 Cal. 73, 8 Pac. Rep. 849:) "In one way or the other it was bound to disclose its adverse claims to the land so that the court might ascertain and determine them. If they were not disclosed, the judgment of the court established the title as it was found to exist in the tenants in common at the date of its rendition, and it was conclusive upon all the parties as to whatever title or claims to the land they had then in hand." The judgment in that action was also a conclusive determination that the parties thereto were tenants in common of the land in controversy according to their respective rights, and that until that time there had existed between them a unity of possession of said land. If, prior to the commencement of that action, the defendant herein had acquired any title as against Randall by virtue of any adverse possession, it should have been set up by it in that action as a defense to his right to have it partitioned in that suit; but, whether alleged or not, the judgment in partition confirming the land to Randall was conclusive that the defendant had not acquired any such title. If at the commencement of that action the defendant was holding the land in adverse possession, but had not held it long enough to ripen into a title, the bringing of the suit suspended the running of the time, and prevented the acquisition by it of a title by prescription. While the suit was pending, the running of the statute of limitations was suspended, and neither party to the action could acquire any rights in the land by virtue of an adverse holding thereof which would impair the judgment that was finally rendered. As the plaintiff herein has succeeded to all the rights of Randall in the land in question, his right to the land must be held superior to that of the defendant, unless the defendant has in some mode acquired an interest therein subsequent to the rendition of that judgment. For this purpose the defendant in its answer set up the statute of limitations, and in its cross complaint alleged that it had acquired a title to the land by prescription. The court found in favor of the plaintiff upon these issues; but it is now urged by the appellant that the refusal of the court to admit certain evidence offered by it for the purpose of sustaining these allegations was error. If, however, the evidence offered was incompetent or manifestly insufficient to establish its averments, the exclusion by the court of such evidence would not constitute a reversible error.

The evidence offered consisted of a conveyance of the land in question from certain parties who were defendants in the partition suit, executed to the defendant February 17, 1870; also a deed from George Turner, dated August 28, 1871; certain tax receipts, and a judgment of condemnation rendered in 1862 by the county court of San Francisco. The record does not show the date at which the action of Randall vs. Winter was commenced, but it is shown that the answer therein of the present defendant was filed more than six months after the execution to it of the deed from the defendants in that action; so that whether this deed was executed prior to the commencement of that action, or subsequent thereto, it could not avail to impair the judgment rendered therein. If it was executed before the action was begun, the title conveyed thereby was adjudicated in that action, and the defendant could not acquire from its codefendants, pendente lite, any title that would not be bound by the judgment. It was held upon the first appeal herein, (68 Cal. 73, 8 Pac. Rep. 849,) that by the judgment in the partition suit the defendant was estopped from claiming any title by virtue of the Turner deed; and it needs no argument to show that, while that suit was pending, the execution to it of a deed could not aid the defendant in acquiring a prescriptive title any more than would any other act of adverse possession; nor would the payment by the defendant of the taxes upon the land, while it was held in cotenancy with the plaintiff in that suit, operate to strengthen its title, or give to it any new title. The deeds offered in evidence would not of themselves establish any adverse holding, and would be of avail to the defendant under its averments only upon its being shown by it that it entered into possession under them. Section 322, Code Civil Proc., provides: "When it appears that the occupant entered into the possession of the property under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument as being a conveyance of the property in question, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, or of some part of the property, under such claim for five years, the property so included is deemed to have been held adversely." The effect of this section is not to make the instrument any evidence of adverse possession, but to extend the adverse possession which may have been held of any portion of the land included in the instrument to the whole of such land. It is still incumbent upon the party offering the deed to give competent evidence of an adverse possession of some part of the land included within the instrument, and, when evidence of such adverse possession has been given, the whole of the land embraced within the instrument is deemed to have been held adversely. It was admitted by the defendant herein that it had been in possession of the land since 1863, and Eliott testified on its behalf: "The defendant is in possession thereof, that is to say, of the lands in dispute in this action, since July 1, 1862, continuously down to the present time,—all the time. That possession has been exclusive in defendant. No one else has been in possession during that period. The defendant has been in the actual occupation of all the property in dispute in this action, exclusive of any other persons, and claiming it adversely to all the world, since July 1, 1862, down to the present time."

The error, if any, in excluding the tax receipts, was cured by the testimony of Eliott, who testified that the defendant had paid the taxes continuously to his knowledge since the year 1866 down to the present time upon the property in dispute in this action. "I know that because I have paid them myself for the company."

The record of the judgment of condemnation is not set forth in the transcript, and we cannot say that the court committed any error in excluding it. As before stated, the judgment roll in Randall vs. Winter, which was before the court, was conclusive evidence that the defendant herein had not prior to that time held any adverse possession of the land thereby partitioned to Randall; and as the evidence offered on behalf of the appellant, and excluded by the court, was insufficient to countervail the effect of this judgment, its admission would not have tended to change the finding of the court, and consequently its exclusion will not authorize a reversal of its action.

The contention of the appellant that the effect of the judgment in partition operates only from the date of the interlocutory decree, and that in support of its plea of a prescriptive title it can avail itself of any adverse possession subsequent to that date, cannot be maintained. The effect of the interlocutory decree was merely to determine the relative rights of the respective parties to the action in the entire tract of land, but did not accomplish any severance of the possession. It was still necessary that a partition of the entire tract, according to these respective rights, should be made, "and the share allotted to each party, with a particular description of each share," reported to the court, (Code Civil Proc. § 765,) and that such report should be confirmed by the judgment of the court; and it is provided in section 766, Code Civil Proc., that this judgment of confirmation "is binding and conclusive on all persons named as parties to the action, and their legal representatives, who have at the time any interest in the property divided, or any part thereof." Until the final judgment confirming the referee's report in partition was entered, it could not be known to which of the parties any particular parcel of the land would fall, and until such segregation had been made there could be no adverse holding of any portion of the land by either party to the action against any of the other parties thereto. The suit in partition was pending until the judgment of confirmation was rendered in December, 1875, and between the parties to an action the statute of limitations never runs against or in favor of either while the action is pending.

GORMAN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,620.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1892.)

Carriers—Ejecting Passenger—Damages.

1. Where a passenger is wrongfully ejected from a railroad car, in a forcible and violent manner, but without physical injury, the jury, in assessing his damages, may consider his injured feelings, the indignity endured, his mental suffering, and wounded pride.

2. An action for forcible ejection from a railway car sounds in tort, under Civil Code, § 3294, providing that "in any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed, the jury * * * may give damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishment."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Jos. P. Jones, Judge.

Action by J. T. Gorman against the Southern Pacific Company to recover for personal injuries sustained by him while a passenger on defendant's road. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Jas. C. Martin and A. A. Moore, for appellant. Chase & Miller, for respondent.

Belcher, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages resulting from his wrongful expulsion from a railroad train owned and operated by the defendant. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 21st day of May, 1890, plaintiff was desirous of being conveyed from Antioch, in Contra Costa county, to Bethany, in San Joaquin county, upon defendant's railroad train, and that he paid to defendant's agent at Antioch the usual fare for that purpose, and received in return a ticket entitling him to such conveyance on the regular passenger train running between the two places named; that he got aboard the train, and soon after leaving Antioch the conductor thereof took up his ticket, and thereafter, and before reaching Bethany, to which place the ticket entitled him to ride upon the train, forcibly, and with violence, expelled and ejected him from the train, and refused him the privilege of riding thereon the balance of the distance to Bethany, about 20 miles; that he sustained damages in consequence of his forcible and violent ejectment from the train, as aforesaid, in the sum of $10,000, for which he asked judgment. The answer of the defendant denied that plaintiff had any ticket, or was forcibly or violently ejected from the train; admitted that he boarded the train at the place charged; and alleged that he never exhibited or showed a ticket, but, to the contrary, paid his fare to the next station from Antioch, and thereafter, before reaching Bethany, upon his refusal to pay further fare, he was given the usual and necessary time to present his ticket or pay, and, doing neither, was requested by the conductor to vacate the train at a station, and near to divers dwelling houses, and that he did so vacate while the train was standing still. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for $500, on which judgment was entered. The defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The principal contention on the part of the appellant is that the case was not one in which exemplary damages could be allowed, and that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive. At the trial the plaintiff testified that he bought a ticket, and got on the train, at Antioch, as stated in the complaint, and his testimony in this regard was confirmed by the station agent. He then proceeded as follows: "Soon after the train left, the conductor, Mr. Nightingill, asked for my ticket, and I gave it to him. We ran to the next station, and, just after we left, the conductor came to me again,—the same one,—and asked for my ticket. I said, 'I gave it to you just after leaving Antioch.' He said I did not, and that I must pay my fare, or show a ticket, or get off the train. I repeated that I had paid my fare once by buying a ticket, which I gave to him. This he denied, and immediately seized the bell rope over his head with one arm, and took me by the collar of the coat with the other, just as you would grab a dog. He threw me up in this way against the door, and pulled me out to the platform, and shoved me so violently down that when I got about two steps down I says: 'For God's sake, don't break my neck.' He said, 'Get off.' * * * When I finally left the train, it had not fully stopped. * * * When the conductor took my ticket, he put it in his pocket. When he asked me the second time for a ticket, after leaving Brentwood, I wanted him to look in his pocket, and he would find it, as proof; but he would not give time to consider that matter at all, but took me violently, and all of a sudden he grabbed me by the coat collar, and lifted me up off my feet, and shoved me before him out of the door. * * * When the conductor took me by the collar, it did not hurt me; that is, it did not hurt me physically. I was not hurt, except that it hurt my feelings to be put off, in the presence of other people, as if I hadn't paid my fare." The conductor was called as a witness by the defendant, and testified that he did not take up or receive any ticket from the plaintiff, and did not use any violence towards him, or seize him by the collar, or put his hands upon him at all; that, when he first called for the ticket, plaintiff said he wanted to go to Brentwood, the next station, and paid his fare thereto, 35 cents, by giving to witness a dollar and receiving back the change; that on leaving Brentwood witness again asked plaintiff for his fare, and told him he must pay his fare, show a ticket, or get off the train, and plaintiff said: "Stop your train, then, and I will get off;" and that he stopped the train in the immediate vicinity of the station, and plaintiff stepped off, without any violence, and without being touched. In rebuttal the plaintiff testified: "I did not say to the conductor, after leaving Brentwood, as he testified, to stop the train and I would get off, nor nothing purporting to convey that idea. I did not get off voluntarily from the train. There would be no object in my getting off. I did not give him a dollar for my fare from Antioch to Brentwood, and he did not give me any change back. We never had one word from the time he took my ticket until we passed Brentwood."

It clearly appears from the verdict that the jurors believed the plaintiff, and not the conductor; and it must, therefore, be assumed that the plaintiff was ejected from the train in the manner and under the circumstances stated by him. But, assuming this to be so, it is still claimed for appellant that plaintiff was entitled to recover only his actual damage, and that the amount allowed was entirely excessive. If a passenger refuses to pay his fare, or to exhibit or surrender his ticket, when reasonably requested so to do, the conductor may put him and his baggage out of the cars, using no unnecessary force, at any usual stopping place, or near any dwelling house, on stopping the train. Civil Code, § 487. But, if a passenger has once paid his fare, he cannot be ejected because he refuses to pay a second time; and if he is so ejected the company will be liable to him in damages. Beach, Ry. Law, § 881. And it will be no defense to an action against the company for a wrongful expulsion that its conductor was honestly mistaken. Quigley v. Railroad Co., 11 Nev. 350; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., 53 N. Y. 25. The measures of damages in an ordinary case of wrongful expulsion, without unnecessary violence or insult, and from which no bodily injury results, is the cost of a ticket from the point of expulsion to the passenger's destination, together with an allowance for such damages as actually result from loss of time. But when the expulsion is accompanied by undue violence, or by insult and abuse, the jury is authorized to consider the injured feelings of the plaintiff, the indignity endured, his mental suffering, the humiliation and wounded pride which one in his condition in life and standing in the community would experience, and to award him compensatory damages therefor. Beach, Ry. Law, §§ 890, 891, and cases cited.

When a passenger is wrongfully expelled from a train, it is a breach of duty on the part of the carrier, and an action in tort will lie to recover damages. Redf. Carr. § 422; Beach, Ry. Law, § 887; Head v. Railway Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. Rep. 217. In the case last cited it was held that, (we quote from the syllabus:) "An action on the case by a passenger against a railway company, for wrongfully expelling him from a train with force and violence, though the declaration allege a contract for carriage, is not for breach of the contract, but for a tort by breach of duty; and punitive as well as actual damages are recoverable, if the circumstances of the particular case warrant such recovery." The Civil Code, § 3294, provides: "In any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed, the jury, in addition to the actual damages, may give damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant." Here the action was clearly in tort for breach of duty; and under the section of the Code quoted the jury was authorized to give exemplary damages, if, in expelling the plaintiff, the defendant was guilty of oppression, fraud, or violence, actual or presumed.

The question, then, is, can it be said, in view of the facts proved, and the well-settled rules of law above stated, that the damages were so excessive as to justify the court in disturbing the verdict on that ground? "The rule is well settled that where a trespass is committed from wanton or malicious motives, or a reckless disregard of the rights of others, or under circumstances of great hardship and oppression, the measure and amount of damages are matters for the jury alone. In such cases courts will not disturb the verdict on the ground that the damages are excessive, unless the amount of damages is so disproportionate to the injury proved as to make it clear that the jury, in rendering the verdict, must have acted under the influence of passion or prejudice."

Russell v. Dennison, 45 Cal. 337. We see nothing in this case to indicate that the jury acted under the influence of passion or prejudice, and in our opinion the verdict cannot be disturbed on the ground that the damages were excessive.

It is also contended for appellant that the court erred in giving certain instructions, and in refusing to give other instructions, to the jury. The instructions given stated the law of the case fully and fairly, and we think correctly. The instructions refused were asked upon the theory that the plaintiff could in no event recover more than his actual damages, and that such damages could not exceed the cost of a ticket from the point where he was expelled to the point of his destination, together with a reasonable allowance for his loss of time. We see no prejudicial error in the action of the court upon the instructions given and refused, and in our opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

YBARRA v. SYLVANY. (No. 19,102.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

Action to Quiet Title—Findings—Sufficiency—Pleading.

1. In an action to quiet title, a finding that plaintiff is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the described parcel of land is a finding of an ultimate fact, and not a conclusion of law.

2. Where defendant pleads that the action is barred by certain specified sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, a finding that plaintiff, at the time of commencing the action, was under the age of 23 years, and his cause of action is not barred by either of the sections pleaded, is sufficiently specific.

3. Where defendant does not raise the objection that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, a finding that plaintiff was under 23 years of age at the time of commencing the action is not objectionable on the ground that he may have been under 21 years of age, and is sufficient.

4. Where defendant claims under a void guardian's deed, and sets up no claim for repayment of money paid, and it does not appear that he paid any for the land, a judgment quieting the title in plaintiff is not erroneous, though no tender of repayment is made.

Commissioner's decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Candelario Ybarra against Stephen Sylvany to quiet the title to a certain parcel of land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dameron & Van Schrever, for appellant, Moye Wicks, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiff's title to a parcel of land in the city of Los Angeles, and the complaint is in the usual form. The defendant, by his answer, denied all the averments of the complaint; denied that he had no right, title, or interest in or to the land; and alleged that he was the owner thereof in fee simple, and was such owner and entitled to the possession of the land when the action was commenced; alleged that he had been in the quiet and peaceable possession of the premises described, holding and claiming the same adversely to the plaintiff and all other persons, for more than five years before the commencement of the action, and that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of sections 1806 and 318 and 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He then set out the facts in a cross complaint and asked that his title be quieted as against the plaintiff. After trial the court below found that the plaintiff "is now, and for a long time hitherto has been, the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of" the parcel of land described in the complaint; that the defendant claims an interest in and to the said land, but his claim is without right, and he has no right, title, or interest therein, or in any part thereof; that the defendant was in the quiet and peaceable possession of the premises described, and claiming the same adversely to the plaintiff and all other persons, for more than five years before the commencement of the suit, but during all that time the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession thereof; that, at the time defendant entered upon said premises, plaintiff was a minor, and defendant entered thereon "under a pretended purchase thereof at an irregular and erroneous and insufficient and void guardianship sale, made in the matter of the estate and guardianship of this plaintiff, and this defendant has never had any title to the said premises or any part thereof, save such title as he claimed to have under the said worthless and void guardianship deed of conveyance;" that plaintiff at the time of commencing the action was under the age of 23 years; and that his cause of action was not barred by either of the sections of the Code pleaded in bar thereof. Judgment was accordingly entered quieting the plaintiff's title, in accordance with the prayer of his complaint. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and then appealed from the judgment and order. No bill of exceptions or statement of the case is brought up in the transcript, and therefore only such questions can be considered as arise upon the judgment roll.

In support of the appeal it is claimed that the findings as to the plaintiff's ownership and right to the possession of the premises in controversy were mere conclusions of law, and therefore insufficient to justify the judgment. This claim cannot be sustained. Finding No. 1 was to the effect that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the described parcel of land. This was a finding of the ultimate fact, and not of a conclusion of law, and was sufficient. Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. Rep. 738; Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367, 22 Pac. Rep. 211.

It is further claimed that the findings upon the issues raised by the plea of the statute of limitations were simply conclusions of law, and insufficient. The defendant pleaded the statute by alleging that the cause of action was barred by certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court found that the action was not barred by either of the sections named. The finding was as broad and specific as the plea, and was sufficient. Gaslight Co. v. Dameron, 67 Cal. 663, 8 Pac. Rep. 595; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 407, 27 Pac. Rep. 1082.

It is also claimed that the finding that plaintiff was under the age of 23 years when the action was commenced was insufficient, because he might have been under the age of 21 years, and so incapacitated to commence the action. A sufficient answer to this claim is that defendant failed to raise the objection that plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue, by demurrer or answer, and it was therefore waived.

Finally, the point is made that the plaintiff had no right, legal or equitable, to have his title quieted as against the defendant, without first paying back to the defendant the money which the latter paid for the land at the guardian's sale. We do not think the judgment can be reversed on this ground. No claim for repayment of any sum of money is set up in the answer or cross complaint, and it nowhere appears in the record that any sum was ever paid by the defendant for the land. If he in fact paid for the land, and considered himself entitled to repayment, as a condition precedent to the quieting of the plaintiff's title, the facts showing his equities should have been set up, and appropriate relief asked. On the whole, we see no merit in the appeal, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Vanclief, C.

WHITTON v. SULLIVAN. (No. 14,090.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

Action on Contract—Pleading—Evidence.

1. In an action by a stenographer to recover for services rendered, the complaint alleged a special contract to take testimony in a contested election case at a certain rate. Defendant admitted the contract, but contended that it was conditional on his success, and, as he was unsuccessful, the contract was void for failure of condition. Held, that the complaint need not state that defendant had agreed to pay the contract price. Pavisich v. Bean, 48 Cal. 364, followed.

2. Where the contract was made by defendant's attorney, on the authority of his client, with plaintiff, and there was no conflict between them as to its terms, but defendant claimed that his attorney had contracted to pay a greater price than he was authorized, it was proper to refuse proof of the market price for similar work to show what the contract was, as this was a matter between the defendant and his attorney.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by A. K. Whitton against Frank J. Sullivan for the recovery of money. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. P. Cole and Frank J. Sullivan, for appellant. H. C. Platt, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. Action brought by respondent, as a stenographer and notary, to recover for services rendered appellant in taking testimony, etc., in a contested election case. A special contract at the rate of 30 cents a folio for the original, and 5 cents a folio for copies, is relied upon as the basis of the action. Appellant admits that such was the contract, but insists that it was conditional upon his final success in securing a seat in congress, and that, if such event did not occur, then the contract price was an amount much less than is now claimed by respondent. Appellant was unsuccessful in his endeavors to oust his opponent, and hence asserts that the contract here relied upon was rendered nugatory by the failure of the condition upon which it was based. Under the authority of Pavisich v. Bean, 48 Cal. 364, and cases there cited, the complaint is unobjectionable.

It is insisted that the court erred in not permitting the appellant to prove the market price for work of a similar character, as tending to show what the contract in this regard really was. It is a well-recognized principle of law that, where a conflict of testimony arises between the parties as to the amount to be paid for services rendered under a contract, proof of reasonable value or market price is admissible as tending to show to some extent what price was agreed to be paid; and this principle is stated and approved in Ellis v. Woodburn, 89 Cal. 129, 26 Pac. Rep. 963. But we do not think the question arises in this case. If the conflict of testimony arose between the respondent and Bowden, and not, as it does, between appellant and Bowden, then this principle of law could be successfully invoked. Bowden and respondent agree in all respects as to the terms of the contract; and Bowden, as the agent of appellant, made the contract. Appellant testified: "I do not recollect ever having had any interview with Mr. Whitton. All the business that I did was with Mr. Bowden. I relied upon him as my attorney and confidential adviser. * * * I made arrangements with Mr. Whitton through Mr. Bowden, my attorney." It will thus be seen that Bowden was authorized by appellant to make a contract with respondent to perform this work, and under such authorization he made a contract with respondent, who performed the work thereunder. Appellant's cause of complaint is simply that his agent, Bowden, exceeded the limitations placed upon his powers, by contracting to pay respondent a greater price for the work than was included in his authority of agency; but this is a matter between the principal and his agent, and with which the party doing the work has no concern.

This principle is clearly declared in Cosgrove v. Ogden, 49 N. Y. 257, where the court said: "The defendants were responsible for this act of Brown. It was an act done by him in the prosecution of their business, and they are not relieved from responsibility therefor by his departure from their instructions in the manner of doing it. The test of the master's responsibility for the act of his servant is not whether such act was done according to the instructions of the master to the servant, but whether it is done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed by the master to do." For these reasons, conceding appellant's evidence to be entirely true, the conflict of testimony did not arise as to the amount agreed to be paid to respondent for the labor performed, but arose as to the nature of the authorization given by appellant to Bowden; and hence the evidence offered upon the question as to the market value of that character of work was immaterial, and the principle of law relied upon to sustain the offer entirely inapplicable. Upon a careful examination of the record we find nothing additional demanding our attention.

PEOPLE v. CURRAN. (No. 20,927.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1892.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE.

Defendant and one F. were jointly indicted for grand larceny. On the trial there was evidence that wheat stolen by F. was stored in an outbuilding of defendant, but there was nothing to connect him with F., nor was it shown that defendant was acquainted with him. Held, that the verdict against defendant was not sustained by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

One Curran was jointly indicted with one Fitzpatrick for grand larceny. Curran demanded a separate trial, and was convicted. From the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

L. J. Maddux, and Eastin & Griffin, (W. E. Turner, of counsel,) for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Paterson, J. The defendant, Curran, and one Fitzpatrick were charged jointly with the crime of grand larceny. Separate trials were demanded. The defendant, Curran, was tried and convicted, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed. We have carefully examined the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions, and find nothing therein which sustains the verdict. It is not a case of conflict of evidence. The testimony tends to show that Fitzpatrick and another stole 29 sacks of wheat, and stored it in a cabin belonging to the defendant, Curran. There is not a scintilla of evidence which connects the defendant with Fitzpatrick, or the person who assisted him in stealing the wheat. It is not shown even that he had any acquaintance with either one of them. The wheat was stolen on the evening of the 18th of July, 1891, and placed in the cabin of the defendant. The following is a summary of all the evidence in the case: Watson testified that on July the 19th he missed 29 sacks from the pile of grain, and discovered the tracks of a spring wagon which had been drawn by two mules from Fitzpatrick's place to the stone cabin; that Curran was hauling wheat on the 19th with a four-horse wagon from the Wilson tract adjoining the tract on which the cabin was situated, and that he had been hauling wheat in the same way every day for some time prior to that time. Waterhouse, a deputy sheriff, testified that Curran told him on the 19th, at Salida, that some one had been putting wheat in his cabin, and wanted him to go over and investigate the matter, as there was likely to be trouble. This statement was made before anything was said to Curran by the officer. McGinn, the warehouseman, testified that Curran had brought wheat to his warehouse every morning, and deposited the same in the name of Mary A. Wilson; that on the morning of the 19th he deposited 40 sacks in the name of Mrs. Wilson, and that these 40 sacks of wheat were afterwards sold, and the money paid to Mrs. Wilson; that Curran never brought any wheat of his own there, and that, as soon as he arrived on the morning of the 19th, he told the witness about his discovery of the wheat in the cabin. Jeffries testified that he saw a wagon on the morning of the 19th standing at the door of the cabin, with some wheat on it; that he did not see any one load any wheat on the wagon at the cabin, but did see the defendant picking up wheat in the field near the same. McGinnes testified that he was a deputy constable; that he was told by Curran on the morning of the 19th that a lot of wheat had been placed in his cabin, but he did not known how it got there; that the defendant said to him he noticed wagon tracks leading into the cabin, and there was something wrong, and had driven in there to see what it was, and had discovered the wheat in the cabin. Grider testified that on the night of the 19th he saw two men hauling wheat from the pile to the cabin. He believed these men to be Will Ducker and Sylvester Fitzpatrick. The only testimony in the record which in any way tends to connect the defendant with the commission of any offense is that of Grider, the owner of the threshing outfit which was working in an adjoining field. He stated that early on the morning of the 19th he saw the defendant loading wheat from the cabin upon his wagon. Inasmuch as there is nothing whatever in the evidence tending to show that the defendant ever had any relations with the parties who stole the wheat, or that he even was acquainted with them, the most that can be claimed for this evidence is that it tended to show the defendant had received the wheat knowing it to have been stolen; but that is not the offense charged here. If it should be conceded, however, that the testimony of Grider of itself tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime of grand larceny, with which he was charged, we think that the evidence, taken as a whole, is entirely consistent with the innocence of the defendant, and that the verdict cannot stand. It is the duty of the prosecution to make out a case against the defendant. All the circumstances of the case, when taken together, show very clearly that Grider was mistaken in saying that the defendant had taken wheat from the cabin on the morning of the 19th. He was at least half a mile distant from the cabin at the time he claims to have watched the operations of the defendant. He was contradicted in two material respects by two witnesses, Jeffries and Watson. The latter testified that he saw the defendant drive up to the cabin and stop, but that he did not take any wheat therefrom; that he was working on the Grider machine; that Grider was lying in his bed at the time the defendant was at the cabin; and that he was too far away from the cabin any way to see what was going on there at that hour in the morning. It is in evidence, uncontradicted, that the defendant had for some time been hauling wheat daily from land surrounding the cabin, and that on the morning of the 19th a portion of his load had been taken from the ground very near the place where the cabin was situated. Several representative citizens of the county of Stanislaus testified that they had known the defendant for several years, and that his reputation for honesty and integrity in the neighborhood where he lived was good,—had never before been questioned. A conviction—especially a conviction of felony—ought not to be permitted to stand on mere conjecture. The prosecution is bound to make out a case. It is difficult to see how the jury, under the instructions of the court, could say that they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, unless there was evidence before them which is not contained in the record before us. "That evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Such evidence alone will justify a verdict." Judgment and order reversed.

BARKER et al. v. DOHERTY et al.

(No. 14,144.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN — TIME OF BEGINNING ACTION.

In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, where the plans and specifications were made a part of the building contract, and were not filed as required by section 1183, Code Civil Proc., and were therefore "wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon," though the contract was void, it might be used as evidence to show the character of the building to be erected, and thereby furnish the test by which it could be known when the building was completed, and the time when lien proceedings should be begun.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by C. A. Barker and others against John P. Doherty and others to foreclose mechanic's lien. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William N. Jordan, for appellants. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Action brought to foreclose certain mechanics' liens. The court found that they were prematurely filed, and rendered judgment for respondents. The plans and specifications were made a part of the contract, and were not filed in the recorder's office; hence the contract was void. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. Rep. 629; Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. Rep. 1111.

Appellants were material men, and the only question involved in this appeal is, were the liens filed prematurely? And that question is answered by a determination as to the time when the building was completed. The court found that the building was completed by the owner (the contractor having decamped) November 30, 1886, according to the plans and specifications contained in the contract. There is evidence showing that a tenant of the owner had some possession of a portion of the building in the preceding month of September, but, as these liens were filed and actions brought prior to the amendment of the Code declaring occupation by the owner to be conclusive evidence of completion, that fact is only material as a circumstance tending to show the true date of completion. In referring to the finding of fact made by the court as to the date of completion of the building, appellants in their opening brief say: "It is evident from the language of this finding that the court had in mind as a standard of completion the requirements of the contract, and, had there been a valid contract between the parties, this finding would undoubtedly have been correct. In the absence of such contract, however, no such standard can be used, and it was the duty of the court to determine the fact of completion without reference to the requirements of any contract. Was it substantially done? Had a structure reasonably well adapted to the use for which it was designed been erected?" Appellants have placed before us no authority supporting the rule upon which they insist; neither can it be supported upon principle.

Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides inter alia, that if the contract is not filed in the office of the county recorder of the county where the property is situated it "shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon." Under this provision of the law, the contract in this case being void by reason of failure of recordation, appellants insist that the test of completion must be determined otherwise than by an inspection of the contract, and that the character of building erected by the contractor is not required in any sense to fill the measure called for by the terms of the contract. In Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 22 Pac. Rep. 509, and in Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. Rep. 629, this provision of the Code was a subject of review; and those cases decided that the contract was void as forming the basis of a recovery, and no legal liability could be created by any of its provisions. This would seem to be apparent from a cursory reading of the provision itself. It was never intended to hold in those cases that the writing could not be used as evidence to determine the character of the building to be erected, and thereby to furnish the test by which it could be known when the building was completed. Such is evident from the fact that in those cases the test of completion of the buildings was furnished by an inspection of the very contracts which were held to be "wholly void." Any other interpretation of this provision of the statute would lead to inextricable confusion, and practically nullify the entire section. It is sufficiently difficult at the present time for lien claimants to determine the true date at which they should file their notice of liens; but if the contract is not to furnish a test of completion, then no test is known to the law, and the difficulties in their way would be absolutely insurmountable. Appellants' rule of construction would compel an owner to pay for the erection of a stone or brick building when the contract called for a wooden building, or require him to pay for a building consisting of two stories and a basement when his contract called for three stories without a basement. In other words, the contractor would be practically free to erect such a building as his fancy might dictate, and thus mulct the owner undeservedly out of large sums of money. This cannot be the law. Let the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

REBUT et al. v. LEGION OF THE WEST.

(No. 14,740.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1892.)

BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATIONS—RECOVERY ON ENDOWMENT COUPON.

A complaint alleged that defendant was an association for the payment of endowments of $600 till each member had received $6,000, payable out of a special benefit fund composed of assessments and fines levied on its members; that defendant delivered to plaintiff a special benefit coupon reciting that "it was not to exceed $600, and should not mature before June, 1891, and was to be void if detached from the annexed certificate;" that in June, 1891, plaintiff, who was a member in good standing, presented the coupon to defendant, which refused to pay the same, though there were sufficient funds in the special benefit fund to pay it. Held, that the complaint is defective, since the coupon is only a part of the contract, the terms of which are not set forth, and since there is nothing to show how much, if anything, in endowments has been paid plaintiff, or that plaintiff is entitled to any portion of the fund on hand.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. SANDERSON, Judge.

Action by one Rebut and others against the Legion of the West on a special benefit coupon. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. Wm. Reade, for appellant. Eugene N. Deuprey and Rogers & Chilstrom, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant is a voluntary, unincorporated association of a large number of persons, having for its object "the payments of endowments in the sum of $600 at certain periods, until the aggregated payments to each member amount to the sum of $6,000," said endowments to be paid out of a fund designated the "Special Benefit Fund," which is composed of the "proceeds from assessments levied upon the members to meet the payment of said endowment of $600 as the same becomes due, and is also composed of fines levied for nonpayment of said assessments, and the accumulation of interests derived from investments of said assessments when collected; that said assessments and fines are levied by said defendant upon its members;" that the plaintiff Josephine was admitted to membership in the association June 4, 1888, and has ever since been a member thereof in good standing. It is further alleged in the complaint that on the day the plaintiff became a member of the association the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff Josephine an instrument, of which the following is a copy: "No. 1879. Special Benefit Coupon. $600. This first coupon, issued by authority of the Grand Lodge, Legion of the West, shall not exceed six hundred dollars, and shall not mature before the month of June in the year 1891. Void if detached from annexed certificate. E. D. FEUSIER, Grand Sec'y. WILLIAM C. FLINT, Grand Commander." It is alleged that plaintiff Josephine was a member of the association in good standing on the 4th day of June, 1891, and on that day presented said coupon to the secretary of the association, and demanded payment thereof; that the defendant "then and there refused to make payment of said sum of $600, provided for in said coupon; that at the time of said presentation of said demand there were ample funds and money in said 'Special Benefit Fund' to fully pay said sum of $600, provided for in said coupon." The complaint concludes with a prayer for judgment against the defendant for the sum of $600, with interest thereon and costs of suit.

It is clear that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the judgment must be reversed. It shows that the association consists of a very large number of persons, who are to be paid $600 each at certain periods until the sum paid to each amounts to $6,000. There is nothing to show how much, if anything, the plaintiff has been paid by the defendant in endowments. It is alleged that there is money enough in the fund to pay the sum of $600, but there is nothing to show that the plaintiff is entitled to draw any amount from that fund. It is not shown that any assessment has ever been made to meet this particular demand. The amount of funds on hand may be necessary for the payment of superior obligations to other members. There is not even an allegation that the amount claimed has not been paid; the only attempt to allege the same being the statement that the defendant refused to make payment at the time the demand was made. The written instrument set forth in the complaint does not show that the plaintiff is entitled to receive anything from the defendant. It is apparent that it is only a part of a contract, the terms of which are not set forth, and is "void if detached from annexed certificate." It shows that in any event the obligation shall not mature before the "month of June in the year 1891," and shall not exceed $600. Whether the obligation therein referred to has matured at all, and how much, if anything, is due under the contract, is not alleged. In addition to the appeal from the judgment, there is an appeal from an order of the court refusing to vacate and set aside the judgment entered against the defendant after default. In view of the fact that the judgment itself must be reversed, it is unnecessary to consider the merits of the appeal from the order referred to, as a reversal carries with it all the relief sought by the defendant on his motion to vacate. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to allow the plaintiffs to amend their complaint.

In re BULLARD'S ESTATE. (No. 14,902.)

PROBATE PRACTICE—FILING ADDITIONAL FINDINGS—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1704, provides that all orders and decrees of the court, or the judge thereof, in probate proceedings, "must be entered at length in the minute book of the court." Held, that after an order was entered from which an appeal was taken, and while it was pending, the trial court had no power to make any new or further findings or decree in regard to the matters involved.

2. Findings of facts will not be set aside because they are intermixed with statements of evidence, argument, and conclusions of law.

3. The sufficiency of a bill of contest in a probate proceeding will not be considered by the supreme court when it is raised for the first time on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Proceeding to contest the will of James H. Bullard, deceased. From an order in favor of contestants, the beneficiary appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, for appellant. Eugene N. Deuprey, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to admit a proposed will to probate. The testator, James H. Bullard, died at the age of about 76 years, leaving, surviving him, three grown-up sons. His estate consisted of real property in the city and county of San Francisco of the alleged value of $6,000. Eight days before his death he executed the will in question, and by it devised all of his estate to his eldest son, except a nominal legacy of five dollars to each of the other two. The eldest son presented the will for probate, and his brothers contested it upon the grounds—First, that the alleged will offered for probate is not and was not the last will, or any will, of James H. Bullard, deceased; second, "that said James H. Bullard, at the alleged time of the pretended making and execution of said pretended will, was not of sound and disposing mind;" third, that the testator, if he made the pretended will at all, was induced by the proponent and his wife to sign it by and through fraud and undue influence. The proponent answered, denying "that, at the time of the making or execution of said will, said James H. Bullard was not of sound or disposing mind," and also denying specifically each of the other grounds of contest. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and on August 19, 1891, a paper was filed by the clerk, which, as appears from the transcript, was signed by the judge, and had at its head the title of the court and cause, and the word "Findings," and was indorsed, "Opinion and findings denying probate of will." In this paper, after a somewhat lengthy statement of the evidence, the facts, and the law bearing upon the question of the testator's mental capacity to make a will, is found the following: "The case made by the contestants upon this issue has not been met or overcome by the defendant. It is probable that the testator was sometimes able to recognize those about him, both before and after the execution of the will, and it may have been that at times he was able to converse and to make known his wants; but it does not necessarily follow that, because of his ability to do these things, that he was of sound and disposing mind. If such a presumption arises, it is overthrown by the facts developed here. It is the case of a very old man whose vital forces were fast ebbing away, brought down to his deathbed by old age, with body and mind alike upon the eve of dissolution, and while sore with sickness, and weak with infirmities, without strength or energy, the hopeless victim of death, called upon in this condition to dispose of his property by a will prepared without his knowledge, and presented in the persuading presence of those to whom obedience, in his helpless illness, had become a habit. I find that he was not of sound and disposing mind." Then, after speaking briefly of the question of undue influence, it is said: "The other grounds of contest do not require special consideration here. I find against them. But it follows from the finding of the mental incapacity of the testator that the proposed will must be denied probate, and it is so ordered." On the day this paper was filed, a minute order was entered by the clerk "that the proposed will herein be, and the same is hereby, denied probate, from the finding of the mental incapacity of the testator herein." From this order an appeal was duly taken by the proponent of the will on October 5, 1891, and the transcript was filed in this court on December 23d following. On March 8, 1892, an order in the case was made by the trial court, reading as follows: "The application on behalf of contestants to alleged will of James H. Bullard, deceased, to have findings and decree regularly submitted to this court by counsel for contestant signed as the proper and only finding and decree herein, coming on to be heard on the 8th day of March, 1892, after due notice, etc.: Now the court signs and makes the findings and decree signed this 8th day of March, 1892, the only proper or any findings and decree in the above-entitled matter; and this court now orders, adjudges, and decrees hereby that the paper filed herein August 19, 1891, and indorsed in the handwriting of the court herein 'Opinion,' is not, and at no time was, in any respect, findings, and such paper was not intended in any wise to be used or construed as findings herein, and that the words, 'and findings denying probate of will,' indorsed thereon, was the act of the clerk in the county clerk's office of this court, and without right or authority, and in no wise was the act of this court; and it is hereby ordered that said paper, filed August 19, 1891, is not, and at no time was, a part of the judgment roll herein, and that the order made upon said paper filed August 19, 1891, and all proceedings thereon, be, and the same are hereby, vacated and set aside." The order thus made, and the findings and decree signed and filed, have been brought here on suggestion of the diminution of the record.

The respondents contend that "the appeal taken herein is void, being based upon false findings, and a false and bogus minute order, and that there is not any appeal taken from the findings and decree of the court, namely, the findings and decree of March 8, 1892," and, therefore, that "the so-called 'appeal' taken by the appellant herein should be forthwith dismissed." The appellant, on the other hand, contends that the order of August 19th—it having been entered at length in the minute book of the court as required by section 1704 of the Code of Civil Procedure—would have become final and conclusive against him if no appeal had been taken therefrom within 60 days after it was entered, and that after the appeal was taken, and while it was pending, the trial court had no power to make any new or further findings or decree in regard to the matters involved. This contention seems to be well supported by the authorities, and in our opinion it must be sustained. Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 77; Baggs v. Smith, 53 Cal. 88; People v. Center, 54 Cal. 236; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 176, 7 Pac. Rep. 480; Savings Union v. Myers, 72 Cal. 161, 13 Pac. Rep. 403. It follows that the findings and decree of March 8th were made without authority, and must therefore be disregarded. The appeal cannot be dismissed.

The question, then, is, can the order of August 19th be sustained? Appellant contends that it should be reversed, upon the grounds (1) that there were no sufficient findings to support it; and (2) that the bill of contest did not state facts sufficient to support the ground of contest on which the order was made, to wit, that of mental incapacity.

The first ground is based upon the statement that the paper found in the record, and designated "Findings," contains a heterogeneous mass of argument, opinion, probative facts, and conclusions of law, but no findings of the ultimate facts; and it is said that "apparently the statement, 'I find that he was not of sound and disposing mind,' is the finding of an ultimate fact, but, when taken in connection with the other portions of the findings, it will at once be perceived that it is but the court's conclusion from the application of the law, as understood by it, to the other facts found, and therefore must be considered a conclusion of law." In support of this position, McClory v. McClory, 38 Cal. 575, and Walker v. Buffandeau, 63 Cal. 316, are cited. In the first case cited it was held that "a document filed by the judge, in which he states the case, the testimony, and the reasons for his decision, and not the ultimate facts established by the evidence, is an opinion, and not a finding, within the meaning of the Code." And in the second case the court, after referring to Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180, said: "But unless the previous findings, in some degree, tend to prove the ultimate fact, it is manifest that the conclusion [as in this case] 'from the foregoing facts' must be treated as what it purports to be,—a conclusion of law from the facts previously recited." In Jones v. Clark the question was as to ratification of a promissory note purporting to have been executed for and on behalf of a mining partnership, and signed by the superintendent as such, and on page 192 it is said: "The court finds several facts which, in the opinion of the court, tend to establish the fact of ratification, and then finds, as a conclusion from them, that the note has been fully ratified and confirmed by the company. This was the ultimate fact to be ascertained, and it is none the less a finding of fact because it is stated as a conclusion from other stated facts." We fail to see how these cases support the contention of appellant. It is true, as stated in Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 306, that findings "should consist of a concise, distinct, pointed, and separate statement of each specific, essential fact established by the evidence, in its proper order, without any of the testimony by which the facts are proved, followed by a similar statement of the conclusions of law drawn from the facts thus found." But, if the ultimate facts are found, they will not be set aside or disregarded because they are intermixed with statements of the evidence, findings or probative facts, argument, and conclusions of law. Here one of the ultimate facts to be determined was as to the mental capacity of the testator to make a will; and in our opinion the finding "that he was not of sound and disposing mind" must be treated as a finding of the ultimate fact, and not as a conclusion of law. This seems clear, for the reason, in the first place, that it purports to be such a finding, and, in the second place, that the previous findings tend, at least in some degree, to establish the fact that he was not of sound and disposing mind.

But, conceding the finding in question to be a finding of fact, it is next claimed that "it is clearly insufficient, because too general and indefinite, as it is not confined, or at all directed, to the mental capacity of the decedent at the very time when the will was executed." We do not think this point can be sustained. Looking at all the findings, it seems clear that the finding objected to was intended to refer, and must be understood to refer, to the time when the will was executed.

The second ground relied upon by the appellant for a reversal of the order relates to the bill of contest, and it is claimed that it is wholly insufficient, because it charges only that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind "at the alleged time of the pretended making and execution of said pretended will." It is urged that the "alleged time" of the execution might not be the true time, and that the time of the "pretended" execution of a will is absolutely irrelevant, and that a "pretended will" is one that is offered as something false or unreal; and it is said the Code provides that "any person interested may appear and contest the will," but says nothing about contesting a pretended will. It is therefore claimed that the bill of contest was insufficient to support the order, and hence it should be reversed. The part of the bill of contest here objected to was not happily written, and, if the proponent had demurred to it on the ground that it was ambiguous or uncertain, very likely his demurrer would have been sustained. No demurrer, however, was interposed, and the question is raised here for the first time. We think it should have been raised in the court below by special demurrer, and, not having been, that it cannot be raised here. It results, in our opinion, that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

POTTKAMP v. BUSS et al. (No. 14,448.)

DEED—PROPERTY CONVEYED—"STORE."

The recital in an instrument of sale that there was conveyed "that certain store, and all the stock and goods therein, and the bakery attached thereto, and the tools and fixtures of said bakery," will be construed as conveying the land on which the store and the bakery attachment stand, and so much as may be necessary for their ordinary use.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by Adolph Pottkamp against John G. Buss and others to quiet title to land. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Hunt and A. D. Lemon, for appellant. F. J. Castlehun, John F. Burris, and M. G. Cobb, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to a lot of land 50x100 feet, and a house thereon, used and occupied as a store and bakery, situate in the city of San Francisco. The defendants answered the complaint, denying plaintiff's alleged title, and averring that Buss is the absolute owner of the house and lot, and that the defendants Pfeiffer & Ludemann (sued as Doe and Roe) are in possession under a lease from him. Defendants also filed what purports to be their cross complaint against the plaintiff, praying that their title may be quieted, and that plaintiff "be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said land and premises adverse to the defendants." Judgment passed for defendants, according to the prayer of their cross complaint. The plaintiff brings this appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff claims title from the defendant Buss by the following written instrument: "John G. Buss to Adolph Pottkamp. Know all men by these presents, that I, John G. Buss, of the city and county of San Francisco, for and in consideration of $2,500, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby sell, convey, and transfer to Adolph Pottkamp that certain store, and all the stock and goods therein, and the bakery attached thereto, and the tools and fixtures of said bakery, situate at the southeast corner of Seventeenth and Dorlores streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California; also 8 horses, 3 wagons, and 1 buggy, with the harness belonging to all and each of said wagons and buggy. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 31st day of March, 1887. [L. S.] JOHN G. BUSS. Witness: JOHN R. KELLY." On July 8, 1887, Buss filed in the superior court his petition under the insolvent act, and was then adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. On July 20, 1887, he applied to the court in the insolvency proceedings to have set apart to him the house and lot in question here as a homestead, and his application was granted. A certified copy of the order setting apart the homestead was recorded on July 23, 1887. The assignee in the insolvency proceeding, however, claimed all the property described in the instrument dated March 31, 1887, above set out. But a compromise was effected between the plaintiff and said assignee by which the latter released to the former the house and lot in question, and the plaintiff released to the assignee all his right to the personal property described in said instrument. The court construed the instrument of March 31, 1887, to be a mere bill of sale of the personal property therein described, and as not intended to convey the premises described in the complaint. I think this was error. There is nothing in the circumstances under which the instrument was executed tending to justify this construction; and it seems to have been given solely upon the ground that the word "store," as used in the instrument, does not mean the house and lot, but only the personal property stored therein. The language of the instrument is: "That certain store, and all the stock and goods therein, and the bakery attached thereto, and the tools and fixtures of said bakery." This very clearly expresses the intention to convey the building in which the goods were stored, and the attachment thereto, in which the business of baking was carried on. See Webster's definition of the word "store;" also Barth v. State, 18 Conn. 440, and State v. Canney, 19 N. H. 137. The conveyance of the storehouse and the bakery attachment thereto included the land on which they stand, and so much as may be necessary for their ordinary use. Dev. Deeds, § 863, and authorities there cited. The evidence tended to prove that the instrument was intended as security for a debt due from Buss to plaintiff; but, had the court so found, the finding would not have justified the judgment, even though the debt secured had been subject to a plea of the statute of limitations. Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. Rep. 74. If the instrument is an unsatisfied mortgage, that fact, with an offer to redeem from it, might perhaps have constituted sufficient ground for defendant's cross complaint praying that his title be quieted against the plaintiff. But the record does not present this question, and it need not be decided. The judgment rendered was based on the ground that the instrument, whether a mortgage or an absolute deed, affected only the personal property; and, there being no issue as to the personal property, there was no occasion to consider whether the instrument was a mortgage of the personal property or not. I think the order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings.

KENNEDY & SHAW LUMBER CO. v. TAYLOR et al. (No. 14,182.)

Partnership—Assuming Antecedent Debts of Members.

1. Civil Code, § 2395, provides that "a partnership is the association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." Held, that a partnership was formed where a contractor, on assigning his contract to others, made a written agreement with them, which agreement provided that the contractor was to do the work, that the parties taking the contract were to furnish the money to carry it on, and receive the payments made as the work progressed, but that the profits were to be equally divided between them.

2. Material was sold and delivered to the contractor before the agreement of partnership was made, and was afterwards used in the work. Held, that a finding that the partnership assumed payment thereof was justified.

Action by the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company against Joseph W. Taylor, W. S. Somervell, and E. Lund, as copartners, for the recovery of money. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants Taylor and Somervell appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Langhorne & Miller, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. This is an action to recover from the defendants, as copartners, the sum of $1,815.59 for lumber sold and delivered to them by plaintiff. The defendant Lund failed to answer, and his default was entered. The other defendants answered, denying all material allegations of the complaint. The cause was tried by the court, and a joint judgment was rendered against all the defendants. The defendants Taylor and Somervell appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The principal point made by appellants is that the finding by the court that the defendants were copartners is not justified by the evidence. On June 18, 1889, the defendant Lund entered into a written agreement with Antonelle and Doe, whereby he agreed to do certain work on section 8 of the sea wall along the water front of San Francisco, and to furnish all materials therefor, and to purchase the lumber needed for the performance of the agreement on his part from the plaintiff. The defendants Taylor and Somervell executed to Antonelle and Doe their bond, guarantying that Lund would perform his contract. On June 20, 1889, Lund assigned his agreement with Antonelle and Doe to Taylor and Somervell, and at the same time the following written agreement was executed between Lund, Taylor, and Somervell: "This agreement, made and entered into by and between Jos. W. Taylor and W. S. Somervell, parties of the first part, and E Lund, party of the second part, all of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, witnesseth: The parties of the first part agree to furnish, as required, all moneys necessary to fulfill and carry out all the conditions of that certain contract and agreement made and entered into by and between Antonelle and Doe and E. Lund, (party of the second part therein,) dated June 18, 1889. For such moneys so advanced and paid, the party of the second part, E. Lund, is to give his whole time and energy to the successfully carrying on and completing of the aforesaid contract in every particular. The parties of the first part, J. W.

Taylor and W. S. Somervell, shall collect all moneys due and owing, or to become due and owing, on account of such contract, pay all bills as presented, and keep or have kept a faithful book of records showing receipts and disbursements, where any and all parties to this agreement shall have free access to review the same at all reasonable times, and make such notes as he may desire therefrom; and, after all just and equitable bills are fully paid and satisfied, the remainder of any moneys remaining as a profit on such contract is to be and shall be divided between the parties hereto equally, share and share alike. Witness our hands and seals this 21st day of June, A. D. 1889. J. W. TAYLOR. W. S. SOMERVELL. E. LUND." Though this agreement is dated June 21st, the court found that it was executed on June 20th, and the evidence justifies this finding. The evidence shows without conflict that this agreement was executed at the same time that Lund assigned his contract with Antonelle and Doe to Taylor and Somervell, which assignment was acknowledged before a notary public, whose certificate is dated June 20th. The evidence further shows that Taylor and Somervell received the installments paid on the contract as the work progressed, and paid the laborers and many other expenses, but failed to pay plaintiff for the lumber delivered mostly on the orders of Lund, but a part of it on their orders.

I think the agreement above set out, and the acts of the parties under it, sufficiently evince a partnership to justify the finding in question. Civil Code, § 2395.[1] The only evidence claimed to be opposed to the finding is that plaintiff, having no knowledge of the partnership while the lumber was being delivered, charged to Lund all that part of the lumber ordered by him. But in cases of secret partnerships and dormant partners a creditor is entitled to recover from all the partners when discovered. Story, Partn. § 138; Crawford v. Stovepipe Works, 83 Cal. 629, 24 Pac. Rep. 836. By the agreement assigned to Taylor and Somervell, under which the work was to be done, they were bound to purchase the lumber from plaintiff; and, by their partnership agreement with Lund, Taylor and Somervell were to pay for the lumber and all other materials required for the work. A small part of the lumber, the price of which was $192.28, had been delivered to Lund, but not used, before the written agreement of partnership was executed, and was afterwards used in the work. Counsel for appellants contends that Taylor and Somervell are not responsible for this in any event. I think, however, that the partnership agreement, and the fact that the lumber was used by the firm in the work, justified the court in finding that the partnership assumed the debt. Randall v. Hunter, 66 Cal. 512, 6 Pac. Rep. 331. Other points are made on the admission and exclusion of evidence, but in view of the existence of the partnership they are immaterial, and the rulings excepted to harmless. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNES, C.

LIGHT v. RICHARDSON. (No. 19,072.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1893.)

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF PARTIES.

1. Defendant and his witnesses were present at the time fixed for trial, but his attorney was absent from sickness. The court stated that the case would be continued on that account, and the defendant and his witnesses left without instructions as to future attendance. The next day the attorney was still sick, and the defendant and his witnesses did not appear. A motion for continuance was denied. Held, that the absence of defendant and his witnesses was excusable, and the continuance should have been granted.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 595, which provides that "the court may require the moving party, where application is made on account of the absence of a material witness, to state on affidavit the evidence which he expects to obtain," is not imperative, and should not be required of counsel when he cannot be aided in making the affidavit by his client, who is excusably absent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Action by W. R. Light against E. W. Richardson. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Willis & Appel and Walter F. Haas, for appellant. H. L. Valentine and Del Valle & Munday, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him, and from an order denying a new trial. The facts are presented in several bills of exceptions.

The cause was set for March 3, 1892, in the superior court, and was on the calendar for trial. The defendant's attorneys were Messrs. Willis & Appel, and on that day Mr. Willis was absent from the county on business, and Mr. Appel was unable to be present on account of sickness. The defendant was present with his witnesses, and ready for trial but for the absence of his attorney. Another cause was then on trial, and, in answer to an inquiry made by plaintiff's attorney, the court stated "that the case would not be reached, and, if reached, it would have to be continued on account of the sickness of Mr. Appel." The defendant and his witnesses soon after left the court room, and, owing to the illness of one of his attorneys and the absence of the other, received no instructions in regard to their future attendance. On the morning of March 4th, Mr. Appel being sick still, Mr. Willis moved the court for a continuance of the cause upon his own affidavit. The affidavit, in addition to the facts above mentioned, alleged that the case had been in Mr. Appel's charge; that it was understood and agreed between the firm of Willis & Appel and the defendant that Mr. Appel should try the case; that Mr. Appel had prepared it, and in consequence he (Mr. Willis) had given only a casual attention to it, either as to the law or the facts; that he had no opportunity of communicating with the defendant or his witnesses; that defendant was not notified to be in court on that day, and that he did not know where he was. The continuance was denied, and defendant excepted.

[1] Civil Code, § 2395, provides that "a partnership is the association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them."

Without deciding the question whether the absence of Mr. Appel, who had charge of the case, and who, as appeared from the affidavit above mentioned, by agreement with the client was to try the case, would have entitled the defendant to a continuance, we think the absence of the defendant and his witnesses under the circumstances was excusable, and that the continuance should have been granted. The defendant was informed by the statement of the court that his attorney upon whom he relied was sick; that if the case should be reached that it would have to be continued for that reason; and, in the absence of the other member of the firm, we do not think it strange that he inferred that it would not be tried until Mr. Appel should recover from his sickness, and that he would be notified by his counsel of the time of trial. But, on the contrary, his presence with his witnesses at the time fixed for trial was sufficient evidence that his absence on the next day was attributable to some other cause; and that cause, we think, should have been attributed to the defendant's mistake of what was implied by the statement of the court in reference to a continuance of the case. It is clearly the intention of the Code, while protecting the court from imposition and unnecessary delays, to secure a reasonable opportunity to litigants to try their causes on the merits, to the end that justice may be done; and while no definite rule can be laid down, embracing all the different circumstances under which continuances should be granted, this spirit and intention of the Code, which is especially manifested in section 473, Code Civil Proc.,[1] should always be borne in mind; for this much, at least, is certain: that, where the circumstances are such as would authorize the court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect, a continuance should be granted.

In respondent's brief some defects in the affidavit for continuance are pointed out. It is said that no merits are shown, and that the facts expected to be proved by the witnesses are not stated. It should be considered, however, that the affidavit was made by counsel not familiar with the details of the case, in the absence of his client, and that the pleadings were verified. We think that about all that Mr. Willis could have said, without subjecting himself to the charge of recklessness, was stated in his affidavit; and, besides, no objection appears to have been made to the affidavit upon these grounds upon the hearing of the motion for continuance. As to stating what is expected to be proved by absent witnesses, the language of the Code is that "the court may require the moving party, where application is made on account of the absence of a material witness, to state upon affidavit the evidence which he expects to obtain." Code Civil Proc. § 595. This requirement is not imperative, and certainly should not be made of counsel when he cannot have the aid of his client, if the absence of the client is excusable.

Other questions raised by appellant on his motion for a new trial need not be considered. We think the court erred in not granting the continuance, and that the judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

BURNS v. CUSHING et al. (No. 14,137.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1892.)

Pleading—Complaint—Indefiniteness.

1. In an action to recover for legal services, a complaint which alleges that in May or June, 1884, defendants retained plaintiff in certain actions, and that, in pursuance of said retainer, said H. (plaintiff) rendered valuable services to said defendants since May or June, 1884, up to the 29th of January, 1890, is within Code Civil Proc. § 454, which provides that a party need not set forth in a pleading the items of an account therein alleged, but must deliver to the adverse party, within five days after a demand thereof in writing, a copy of the account, and is not demurrable as being ambiguous and uncertain. Tompkins v. Mahoney, 32 Cal. 231; Hart v. Speck, 62 Cal. 187,—followed.

2. Under Code Civil Proc., which provides that the court must disregard any error in the pleadings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, a complaint averring that said services were reasonably worth the sum of $750, and defendants have only paid the sum of $200 on account, leaving the sum of $550 unpaid thereof, is not demurrable as failing to aver nonpayment of the amount sued for.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by J. T. Burns against Ellen Cushing and others to recover a claim for legal services performed for defendants by C. F. Hanlon. The claim was assigned to plaintiff by Hanlon, and he brings suit to recover. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Otto Tum Suden, for appellants. John F. Hanlon, for respondent.

McFarland, J. This is an action to recover a balance due for legal services alleged to have been rendered by Charles F.

---

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 473, provides that "the court may * * * relieve a party * * * from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

Hanlon, and assigned to plaintiff. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal therefrom upon the judgment roll. The only point made is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint.

1. In the complaint it is averred that in May or June, 1884, defendants retained and employed said Hanlon to commence, prosecute, and defend certain actions and proceedings at law and in equity and probate, and that, "in pursuance of said retainer, said Hanlon rendered valuable services to said defendants, and each of them, in and about the premises, since May or June, 1884, up to the 29th day of January, 1890." Appellants assailed this averment by special demurrer as ambiguous and uncertain; and in their briefs they argue that it is uncertain, because no particular action or proceeding is stated in which any of the alleged services were rendered, no time given at which any part of the services were rendered, no facts stated which would enable defendants to prepared a defense, etc. We think, however, that the averment comes within the provision of section 454, Code Civil Proc.[1] and that appellants should have demanded a bill of particulars, under that section of the Code. Tomkins v. Mahoney, 32 Cal. 231; Hart v. Speck, 62 Cal. 187.

2. Appellants contend that the demurrer should have been sustained because the complaint fails to aver nonpayment of the amount sued for. The averment on that subject is as follows: "Plaintiff, upon his information and belief, alleges that said services were reasonably worth the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, and defendants have paid the sum of two hundred dollars on account, and in part payment thereof, leaving the sum of five hundred and fifty dollars unpaid thereof." This form of averring nonpayment would certainly not gratify the taste of an accomplished and experienced pleader. The present participle is not a part of speech particularly well adapted to carrying a predicate. But under our liberal system, which expressly provides that "the court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the pleading * * * which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties,"[2] we think that the averment in question must be allowed to pass muster. And it must be considered as of the date of the filing of the complaint, although it appears that the cause of action was assigned to plaintiff on the day before the action was commenced. Moreover, we think that, if the averment could be deemed defective for the reason above considered, the defect was supplied by the answer. The judgment is affirmed.

TYLER et al. v. DAVIS. (No. 13,551.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1892.)

SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS.

Where the court found that plaintiff had rendered services worth a stated amount, and that they had been paid a named sum, the finding sufficiently made it appear that only the amount named had been paid, and defendant could not object that it did not support a judgment for the difference.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by William B. Tyler and another against George O. Davis to recover for legal services performed by plaintiffs for defendant. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The answer denied every allegation of the complaint, and set forth two affirmative defenses: (1) That the services alleged to have been rendered were in fact rendered for, and on employment by, one M. H. McDonald, the real party in interest in the cause mentioned in the complaint; (2) that all legal services rendered for defendant by either of the plaintiffs were rendered by plaintiff George W. Tyler, individually, upon a certain contract therein set forth, and that said "plaintiff has been paid in full for all services performed in said cause for defendants." The findings are as follows: "(1) That George O. Davis employed the plaintiff to defend the suit of Smith v. Davis, as alleged in the complaint, which service they accepted and performed, and their services in that behalf were reasonably worth the sum of one thousand dollars; (2) that plaintiff did not make the agreement set forth in the answer of defendant, but plaintiff George W. Tyler was indebted to the firm of Cope & Davis, at the time of their employment, in the sum of $180, and Mrs. M. H. McDonald, as agent for defendant, paid to plaintiffs, since said employment, the sum of four hundred and five ($405) dollars, making in all $585, which is a proper offset against the claim of plaintiffs." Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, and against defendant, for $415, principal, and $58.50, costs of suit.

D. H. Whittemore, Wm. H. Sears, and James G. Maguire, for appellant. John D. Sullivan, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The findings in this case are, in our opinion, sufficient to support the judgment. The evidence is embodied in a bill of exceptions, and no claim was made by defendant upon the trial that anything more was in fact paid plaintiffs than is found by the court. The finding in regard to the amount paid to plaintiffs is to be construed as a finding that only the sum mentioned therein had been paid. Judgment and order affirmed.

RILEY v. NANCE. (No. 19,093.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 17, 1893.)

Attachment Lien on Land—Judgment—Merger—Release by Bond on Appeal — Sheriff's Deed—Defendant's Deed—Priority of Title.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 671, provides that from the time a judgment is filed it becomes a lien on all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county, owned by him "at the time," and that the lien continues for two years, "unless the enforcement of the judgment be stayed on appeal by the execution of a sufficient undertaking, as provided in this Code, in which case the lien ceases." Held, that where an attachment debtor conveyed land after it was attached, but before judgment, there was no judgment lien thereon into which the attachment lien could merge, and the latter was not released by the execution of a bond on appeal from the judgment.

2. In such case the sheriff's deed to a purchaser at a sale under execution issued on the judgment takes effect from the date of the attachment, and will prevail over the title derived from the grantee of such attachment debtor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. N. Clark, Judge.

Action by William Riley against Roy Nance to quiet the title to certain real estate. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

I. Hall, for appellant. E. C. Brown, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This is an action to quiet title. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, as follows: In an action entitled H. vs. W. and A., commenced May 4, 1888, the land in question, being that of W. and A., was attached and held until judgment in the case, November 12, 1888. May 19, 1888, W. and A. conveyed said land by deed to R. December 10, 1888, W. and A. appealed to this court, giving the undertaking for said appeal and stay of execution. In July, 1889, said judgment was affirmed. September 16, 1889, said land was sold, under execution issued upon such judgment in attachment, to plaintiff's grantors. July 19, 1888, R. put a mortgage on said land, and respondent claims title to the land as a purchaser at a foreclosure sale thereunder in November, 1889. The court below held that the attachment lien merged in the judgment lien, and by the giving of the undertaking on appeal to stay execution the attachment lien was released and lost, under section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and that the sale of the land in question under execution upon the attachment judgment gave no title; and that the title of R. must prevail.

Section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in referring to a judgment lien, says: "The lien continues for two years, unless the enforcement of the judgment be stayed on appeal by the execution of a sufficient undertaking, as provided in this Code, in which case the lien of the judgment ceases." Owing to the views entertained upon another branch of the case, we do not find it necessary to review the decision in Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 121, wherein the doctrine of the merger of an attachment lien into that of a judgment lien is fully discussed, and which decision is adverted to in Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 174. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that no judgment lien existed upon this realty, and that consequently the attachment lien could not possibly have been merged therein. At the time the judgment was rendered in the action wherein the attachment had been issued and levied, the judgment debtor had no interest in the realty whatever. He had conveyed all his title to R. To be sure, it was conveyed subject to the attachment lien, but R. had a complete and perfect title except as to this lien. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 671) provides that from the time the judgment is docketed it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterwards acquire, until the lien ceases. It was said in People v. Irwin, 14 Cal. 434: "It is not denied that Rigby was a judgment creditor, but it is claimed that his judgment never became a lien upon the property, and that the proceedings under it were therefore ineffectual for any of the purposes of a redemption. The reasons assigned are that, when the judgment was recovered, the title to the property had passed from the judgment debtor and vested in the relator, and that in the hands of the latter the property was not subject to the lien of the judgment, nor to any proceedings affecting the title, the validity of which depended upon such lien. It is undoubtedly true that the statutory lien of a judgment upon the real estate of the judgment debtor can attach only upon property in which such debtor has a vested legal interest. This was admitted arguendo in the case of McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365, and we have no doubt of its correctness."

A sheriff's deed executed in pursuance of an execution sale under a judgment in an attachment suit takes effect from the date of the attachment, if the levy is such as to create a lien. Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 171. It follows that appellant's title is anterior to, and must prevail over, the title obtained under the foreclosure proceedings. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment for the plaintiff upon the findings.

We concur: Paterson, J.; Harrison, J.

ISRAEL v. COLLINS. (No. 19,089.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

Quieting Title—Description—Sufficiency.

In an action to quiet title, plaintiff described the land in question as "the west 80 acres of Pueblo lot numbered 1,258, according to the Pasco map of the city of San Diego." As evidence of her title, plaintiff introduced a deed from the city, from which both parties claimed, wherein was conveyed to her a lot described as "being that lot of land containing 80 acres, and situate north of and immediately adjoining the 80-acre lot granted to P." Plaintiff attempted to prove the location of the lot granted to P., but the only evidence of such grant was an entry in the official books of the city, showing that her petition for a lot had been filed, and the maps put in evidence were such that only a hazardous guess could be arrived at as to the location of the lands she had petitioned for. Plaintiff also put in evidence, in proof of a subsequent grant which it was claimed was made to amend the description of the land in the former deed, a resolution of the city's trustees that 80 acres of land out of the western part of Pueblo lot No. 1,258 be deeded to plaintiff, the same having been sold her by a former board, and a deed given without a proper description of the land. The resolution was signed by one of the trustees and the secretary of the board, and the trustee testified that he signed and acknowledged a deed pursuant to the resolution, but did not deliver it, as others were to sign it, and he did not know what became of it. It appeared that the deed was never delivered directly to plaintiff, and that neither she nor her husband ever saw it or had actual possession of it. No offer was made to prove its contents except by the resolution of the trustees. Plaintiff was never in possession of the lot which she claimed, and never improved it. Held, that she was properly nonsuited.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Mary A. Israel against Charles Collins. From a judgment nonsuiting plaintiff she appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson & Titus, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to a lot of land situate in the city of San Diego. After the close of the evidence in chief on the part of the plaintiff, the court, on motion of the defendant, rendered a judgment nonsuiting the plaintiff, and the appeal is from this judgment, upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions.

The complaint is in the the usual form, and the answer denies plaintiff's alleged title. The complaint describes the land in question as follows: "The west eighty (80) acres of Pueblo lot numbered one thousand two hundred and fifty-eight (1,258) according to the Pasco map of the city of San Diego;" and it is admitted that the city of San Diego was the owner of this lot on the 12th day of February, 1889, and that both parties claimed title from that city. As evidence of her title the plaintiff introduced a deed to her from the city of a lot described as follows: "Situate in the said city, and more particularly described as follows: Being that lot of land containing (80) eighty acres, and situate north of and immediately adjoining the (80) eighty acre lot granted to May Pollock, in consideration of and for a lot of land sold by former trustees, which good and sufficient reasons were shown belonged to Mary A. Israel, according to the official map of the said city made by Charles H. Poole, A. D. 1856, and on file in the office of the secretary of said board" (of trustees of the city.) It will be observed that this description by no means identifies the lot described as that described in the complaint. It does not describe it as being numbered; nor does it refer to the Pasco map, for the reason, doubtless, that the Pasco map was not made until May, 1870, more than a year after the deed was executed.

For the purpose of applying the description to the lot in question the plaintiff introduced the Poole map referred to; but it appeared, and is admitted, that the Poole map does not include any part of the lot numbered 1,258 on Pasco's map. For the same purpose the plaintiff attempted to prove the location of the lot said to have been granted to May Pollock, but failed to prove any grant to Pollock, or that Pollock ever possessed or claimed any land south of, or adjoining, lot 1,258, as located on Pasco's map. The only evidence relating to a grant to Pollock are the following entries in official books of the city: "San Diego, Jan. 21, 1869. To the Honorable Board of Trustees: I beg leave to ask your honorable board for eighty acres N. W. 1,773, and your petitioner will comply with the conditions imposed in like cases. MAY POLLOCK. Indorsed: Petition of May Pollock." In another book was the following: "No. 212. Date, Jan. 21, 1869. Name of applicant, May Pollock. Description, 80 acres N. W. 1,773." There is no evidence that any action was ever taken upon this petition other than to file it and make the above entry. These acts evince no official recognition of the description in the petition as a correct or intelligible description of any land belonging to the city, and without extraneous aid the description is unintelligible. The only extraneous evidence which can be claimed to touch it is that there is a lot on each of the maps above named numbered 1,773, but very different in shape, and apparently different in area. The maps appear to be on different scales, though no scale or point of compass appears on the copy of either in the transcript. On the Pasco map, lot No. 1,258 adjoins one side of No. 1,773, (probably the northern side,) but the junction extends only about one half the length of lot 1,773, while the other half of the same side is bounded by lot numbered 1,257 on the Pasco map; but neither of the lots numbered, respectively, 1,257 and 1,258, is laid down on the Poole map. From all this I think nothing more definite than a very hazardous guess can be arrived at, even as to the intended location of the 80 acres petitioned for by Pollock.

Plaintiff next attempted to prove a subsequent grant which she says was made for the purpose of amending the description of the land intended to be conveyed by the aforesaid grant of February 12, 1869, and for this purpose read in evidence the following resolutions of the city's trustees, passed at a regular meeting December 8, 1870: "Resolved, that eighty acres of land out of Peublo lot (western part) No. 1,258 be deeded to Mrs. Mary A. Israel, the same land having been sold to her February 19, 1869, by a former board, and deed given without a proper description of the land. JAMES MCCOY. A. B. MCKEAN, Secretary." James McCoy testified that the above is his signature, and that he was one of the city trustees at the time the resolution was adopted; that as one of the trustees he signed and acknowledged a deed pursuant to that resolution, which passed out of his hands, and he did not know what became of it. He did not deliver the deed, as others were to sign it with him. Supposes the deed was drawn by the secretary in whose office he signed it, and that, if it was executed by the other trustees and delivered, it must have been delivered by the secretary. D. K. Israel, husband of the plaintiff, testified that Judge Hayes was attending to the matter for his wife; that witness had delivered the old deed to him with other papers pertaining to the matter; and that Hayes had died about 10 years before the trial. The testimony of this witness further tended to prove that, if the deed had been delivered at all, it might have been delivered to Hayes for his wife, and that diligent search had been made for it without success. It appeared that the alleged second deed was never delivered by any person directly to plaintiff, and that neither she nor her husband ever saw it or had actual possession of it; but no offer was made to prove its contents as to description of the land, or otherwise, except as above stated. D. K. Israel testified that by his order a survey had been made for his wife of the "west eighty acres of Peublo lot 1,258," but he did not remember when, nor is there any evidence as to the boundary lines by that survey. He further testified that he had paid taxes for his wife on "west half of lot 1,258" for twelve years between 1872 and 1887, and that all the receipts therefor were in his name, except two, which were in the name of his wife. It appears that these receipts were put in evidence, but the record contains no copies of them, and it does not appear to whom the lot was assessed. The plaintiff was never in possession of any lot which she claims to have purchased from the city, and never improved any such lot. The only evidence of payment of any consideration for the lot claimed is a ledger entry as follows: "1869. Dr. Mary A. Israel. Feb. 18. To 80 acres N. of Pollock's, $1.00." "Cr. Feb. 18. By cash in full, $1.00." I think the deed of February 12, 1869, is void for uncertainty in its description of the land, and that the evidence has no substanial tendency to prove that the alleged second deed was ever executed by the board of trustees of the city, and would not have justified a finding to that effect. One member of the board could not have executed such a deed. See acts creating and incorporating this board of trustees, approved January 30 and April 28, 1852, (St. 1852, pp. 223, 225.) It follows that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BENOIT. (No. 20,935.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1893.)

INCEST—EVIDENCE.

In the trial of defendant for incest with his daughter, it is reversible error to permit the daughter to testify that, about two years prior to the commission of the alleged crime, she was living as a prostitute, with her mother, at a house of ill fame, and giving to her father the earnings of her shame; such testimony being irrelevant, and tending to prejudice defendant before the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. TORRANCE, Judge.

Charles Benoit was convicted of incest, and appeals. Reversed.

Eugene Daney, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The appellant was tried and convicted upon a charge of having committed incest with his daughter, a girl of about 15 years of age, and sentenced to the state prison for a term of 10 years. At the trial the district attorney was permitted, against the objection and exception of the defendant, to show by the testimony of the daughter that, about two years prior to the commission of the alleged crime, she was living as a prostitute, with her mother, at a certain house in San Diego, and giving to her father the earnings of her shame. This testimony was entirely irrelevant and immaterial to the determination of the issue before the court, and its admission was manifest error. Its evident effect was to prejudice the defendant before the jury by attempting to show his turpitude of character. But, however base his nature may have been, he was not on trial for any offense except that named in the information; and it was as much error for the prosecution to introduce evidence tending to show his bad character as it would have been to give evidence of other and distinct crimes that he had committed.

The judgment and order are reversed.

SANTA CLARA VALLEY MILL & LUMBER CO. v. WILLIAMS et al. (No. 14,438.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—TIME OF FILING NOTICE—MATERIAL MEN—PERSONAL LIABILITY OF OWNER.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1187, provides that any trivial imperfection in the construction of any building shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien. Held, that where a building was erected at a cost of $4,700, and was completed on March 7, 1889, with the exception of about $7 worth of alteration, which was done on April 6, 1889, the building was completed on March 7th, within the meaning of the statute, and a lien for materials furnished, filed more than 30 days after March 7th, was not in time.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1183, provides that the contract for building a house shall be in writing, and, before the work is begun, shall be filed with the recorder, otherwise to be void, and no recovery had thereon; and that labor done and material furnished by others than the contractor shall be deemed furnished at the instance of the owner, and be deemed a lien. Held, that when the original contractor had not filed his contract, and the material man had not filed any lien under the statute the latter is not entitled to a personal judgment against the owners of the building for material furnished the contractor. Lumber Co. v.

Schmitt, 16 Pac. Rep. 516, 74 Cal. 625, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

(Not to be published in California Reports.)

Action by the Santa Clara Valley Mill & Lumber Company against Joseph E. Williams and Mary A. Williams, owners of a building for which plaintiff furnished materials, and O. F. Fuller and E. L. Lashbrook, the contractors, to recover the value of the materials furnished. There was a judgment in favor of the owners, and a personal judgment against the contractors in favor of plaintiff. From the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Jarboe and W. S. Goodfellow, for appellant. J. R. Patton, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendants Joseph and Mary Williams, who are husband and wife, employed the defendants Fuller and Lashbrook to build a dwelling house, for a price exceeding $1,000, under a written agreement executed before the work was commenced, but the contract was never filed for record in the recorder's office of the county in which the house was to be built. The plaintiff furnished the lumber to be used and which was used in the construction of the house to Fuller and Lashbrook under a contract with them alone. After the house was completed, viz. on April 16, 1889, the plaintiff filed in the office of the county recorder its claim and notice of lien upon the house, to secure an unpaid balance of $2,201.64, due for the lumber furnished to Fuller and Lashbrook. The object of this action is to recover a personal judgment against all the defendants for the amount due plaintiff for lumber, and also to enforce the alleged lien. The court found as a fact that plaintiff's claim and notice of lien had not been filed for record within 30 days after the house was completed, and thereupon denied plaintiff any relief against the defendants Joseph and Mary Williams, and gave judgment in their favor for their costs, but rendered a personal money judgment against the defendants Fuller and Lashbrook for the amount claimed by plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of Joseph and Mary Williams, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial as to them.

1. Appellant contends that the finding that plaintiff's notice of lien was not filed within 30 days after the completion of the house is not justified by the evidence. The evidence is sufficient to show that Fuller and Lashbrook completed their work upon the house on or before March 7, 1889, and that the house was accepted and used by Williams and wife before March 15, 1889; of all which plaintiff had notice. The house, as finished by Fuller and Lashbrook, had upon it an ornament called a "finial," and in it a water-closet. Some time after Fuller and Lashbrook had completed their work, including the finial and water-closet, Williams and wife expressed their dissatisfaction with the finial, because it was not large enough to correspond with the tower, and also complained that the seat in the water-closet was defective; and Mrs. Williams said she would rather pay for a larger finial than not to have it. Thereupon the plaintiff furnished a larger finial, and a satisfactory seat for the closet, which were delivered on March 21, 1889, and were put in place on the house, at the expense of the owners, on April 6, 1889. If the house was not completed until these alterations were made, the notice of lien was filed for record in due time; otherwise not. As to the imperfection of the finial and seat of the water-closet, and the alterations thereof, the court found that they were trivial in comparison with the entire construction of the house. This finding, also, is excepted to, as not being justified by the evidence. It appeared that plaintiff had estimated the price of the finial at $5, and the seat for the closet at $2, while the cost of the house, including the materials therefor, was $4,700. Upon this basis, I think, the finding in question was justified by the evidence. Every essential part of the building had been constructed prior to March 7, 1889. Only two small items of the work was claimed to be imperfect, and to perfect these required an expense of only $7. Section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "any trivial imperfection in * * * the construction of any building * * * shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien." In Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. Rep. 686, it was held that a defect in work which could be perfected at an expense of $5 was trivial compared with the contract price of $145. The case of McIntyre v. Trautner, 63 Cal. 429, applies to neither the law nor the facts of this case. In that case the owner refused to accept the work from the contractor until perfectly completed, and the contractor completed the work. In this case the contractors did nothing after they delivered their work; and there is no evidence that they did not complete the house according to the directions and designs of the owners, (there being no valid express contract.)

2. It is further contended that plaintiff was entitled to a personal judgment against Joseph and Mary Williams, the owners of the building, for the value of the lumber furnished to Fuller and Lashbrook. In the case of Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, 74 Cal. 625, 16 Pac. Rep. 516, this point was directly decided against appellant's contention. This is admitted; but counsel for appellant contends that the decision in that case should be overruled. But, as the statute[1] seems fairly susceptible of the construction put upon it by that decision, and since it does not appear that the ends of justice would generally be promoted by the construction proposed by counsel

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 1183, provides that contracts for building a house shall be in writing, and before the work is begun shall be filed with the recorder, otherwise to be void, and no recovery had thereon; and that labor done and materials furnished by others than the contractor shall be deemed furnished at the instance of the owner, and be a lien.

for appellant, I think the decision should stand. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

STROZYNSKI v. STROZYNSKI. (No. 14,278.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1893.)

DIVORCE—DIVISION OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY—REVISION ON APPEAL.

1. Civil Code, § 148, which provides that the division of community property by the trial court in granting a divorce to the spouses is subject to revision on appeal in all particulars, including those in the discretion of the trial court, empowers the appellate court to review the action of the trial court for any degree of error, though not amounting to an abuse of discretion.

2. On granting a wife a divorce for extreme cruelty, where it appears that the husband is a shoemaker, earning from $40 to $60 per month, the entire community property, consisting of a house and lot worth $2,000 and the household furniture, should be awarded to the wife, as this will still leave her to earn her own support, and that of her minor daughter, awarded to her custody.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by Kataryna Strozynski against Bolislaus Strozynski for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The divorce was granted, and, from a decree awarding her one half of the community property, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. Morgenthal, for appellant. Wm. C. Flint and W. N. Barrows, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. A divorce was granted on that ground, and one half of the community property (undivided) was awarded to the plaintiff, and the other half to the defendant. The plaintiff brings this appeal from that part of the decree awarding one half of the property to the defendant.

The appeal comes here upon the judgment roll, from which it appears that the parties were married in Germany, February, 1873, and have one child, a daughter, aged 15 years at the time the action was commenced, (September, 1889,) the custody and care of whom was given to the plaintiff; that the community property consisted of a lot 57x105 feet at corner of Twenty-First and Sanchez streets, San Francisco, and a dwelling house thereon, the value of the lot and house being about $2,000, and the household and kitchen furniture in the dwelling house, the value of which does not appear; that the defendant is a shoemaker, whose average earnings are alleged in the complaint to be $60 per month, but denied in the answer to exceed $40 per month, and no finding upon this issue. The finding as to the alleged extreme cruelty is in the following language: "The defendant has treated her with extreme cruelty, has been guilty of extreme cruelty to her, has beaten her and called her vile names, within the year past." The defendant was adjudged to pay plaintiff's costs, taxed at $66.90, and $50 for her attorney's fees; both to be paid "to Benjamin Healy, plaintiff's counsel herein, at his office," for whom the present attorney for appellant was afterwards substituted.

It must be presumed that the foregoing statement comprises all the facts upon which the judgment of the trial court was based; and upon these facts the question to be decided is not merely whether that court abused its discretionary power in dividing the community property, but also whether it erred in the exercise of such power. Ordinarily the exercise of the discretionary power of the trial court will not be revised by the appellate court, except on the ground that such power has been abused; but, on appeals from judgments dividing community property in cases of divorce on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty, the Civil Code has provided a different rule. Section 146 of that Code provides: "(1) If the decree be rendered on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case and the condition of the parties, may deem just. (2) If the decree be rendered on any other ground than that of adultery or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be equally divided between the parties." Section 148 provides that "the disposition of the community property, * * * as above provided, is subject to revision on appeal in all particulars, including those which are stated to be in the discretion of the court." By this section the legislature must have intended to subject the exercise of the discretion of the trial court, in dividing the community property, to revision on appeal for any apparent degree of error, though not amounting to an abuse of discretion; otherwise, the section effected no change in, nor added anything to, the theretofore well-settled rule that the appellate court will not undertake to revise the exercise of discretionary power, except it appear that such power has been abused; and this construction of the section has been practically, if not expressly, adopted by this court.

The case of Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 62, was very similar to this case. In that case a divorce was granted the wife on the ground of extreme cruelty by beating her. The trial court divided the community property equally between them. Upon appeal by the wife this court awarded her three fourths of the property, and directed the trial court to modify the judgment to that effect. The appeal seems to have been taken on the judgment roll, as it appears that the evidence was not before the appellate court. The court cited section 148 of the Civil Code, and apparently rested its authority to revise the judgment upon it. In Brown v. Brown, 60 Cal. 579, a divorce was granted the wife on the ground of extreme cruelty. The trial court awarded her one half of the community property. On appeal this court modified the judgment in this respect by awarding her three fourths. Here, again, this court expressly based its power to revise the judgment upon section 148 of the Civil Code. An act of 1857, relating to husband and wife, provided that, when a "decree of divorce is rendered on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty, the party found guilty thereof shall only be entitled to such portion of the common property as the court granting the decree may, in its discretion, from the facts of the case, deem just and allow; and such allowance shall be subject to revision on appeal in all respects, including the exercise of discretion by the court below." St. 1857, p. 199. Under this statute the case of Eidenmuller v. Eidenmuller, 37 Cal. 364, was decided. The plaintiff (wife) was granted a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, though it was said the conduct of the plaintiff was not free from fault. The custody of the three younger children was given to the wife, and the two elder to the husband. The defendant, being a physician, had an income of about $1,800 per annum. The common property consisted of a house, lot, and household furniture worth about $4,500, and a horse and buggy worth $450. The lower court awarded to the plaintiff all the property except the horse and buggy, which was given to defendant, and ordered the defendant to pay her counsel fees and $75 per month for support. On appeal by defendant the appellate court said: "We cannot say that there was any abuse, or even improper exercise, of discretion in the disposition of the common property;" thus distinguishing an abuse from an improper exercise of discretion. But as to the alimony the court said: "We are of the opinion that the monthly allowance of $75 was too great a portion of his earnings;" and reduced it to $50 per month, apparently on the ground that the allowance, on the facts appearing, was an improper exercise of discretion,—a mere error of judgment as to a conclusion of fact,—and not an abuse of discretion. The result was that the plaintiff was awarded ten elevenths of the common property and one third of defendant's income, on a state of facts very similar to the facts in the case at bar, in which, I think, the trial court should have awarded to the plaintiff all the community property, namely, the lot and dwelling house and the household furniture. The house and lot constitute but a humble home for the plaintiff and her minor daughter, and it cannot be presumed that the household furniture was more than was necessary for their use. Allowing them all these, they are still left, so far as appears, to earn their support; and, as before stated, the case must be decided on the facts appearing from the judgment roll, and it cannot be presumed that either party had separate property. Indeed, it must be presumed that the court found all the material facts not admitted by the pleadings. The case of Bovo v. Bovo, 63 Cal. 77, is not in point for the respondent. The reporter's headnote is misleading.

I think the cause should be reversed, with directions to the lower court to modify that part of the judgment relating to the division of the community property, by awarding to the plaintiff all the community property, real and personal, described in plaintiff's complaint.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with instructions to the court below to modify that part of the judgment relating to the division of the community property by awarding to the plaintiff all the community property, real and personal, described in the plaintiff's complaint; and as so modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

HATTON v. HOLMES et al. (No. 19,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 18, 1893.)

NOTARY PUBLIC—LIABILITY FOR FALSE ACKNOWLEDGMENT—DAMAGES.

Plaintiff, on representations of J. that he was the agent of K., who owned certain land, took a mortgage on the land, purporting to be signed and acknowledged by K., and delivered to J. a check for $1,000, payable to K. J. presented the check to a bank, and received payment thereon, the check being indorsed by K. The acknowledgment of the deed was false, and the indorsement of K.'s name on the check was a forgery. Held, in an action by plaintiff to recover the value of the check against the notary who took the false acknowledgment, that plaintiff had no right of action, in that the bank, having paid the check under a forged indorsement, acquired no rights therein against plaintiff, and could not charge the amount paid against plaintiff's account.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Edward Hatton against A. C. Holmes and others, to recover for loss alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff, by reason of defendant Holmes having taken a false acknowledgment to a mortgage of certain land, on which plaintiff had loaned money. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Burnett & Gibbon, for appellant. Wilson & Lamme, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In September, 1887, J. W. Keifer, of Kansas City, Mo., purchased eight acres of land situate in the county of Los Angeles, in this state, and had the deed made to Maria J. Keifer, his wife. In December, 1889, one O. B. Jenkins applied to the plaintiff for a loan of money on this land. He represented that Maria J. Keifer, of Kansas City, was the owner of the land, and that he was her agent, and wanted to borrow the money for her. He exhibited to plaintiff a certificate showing title in Mrs. Keifer, and together they examined the property, and plaintiff agreed to loan on it $1,000, if the mortgage was properly drawn up and duly certified. On the 2d day of January, 1890, Jenkins delivered to plaintiff a note for $1,000, payable to his order two years after date, with interest at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and, if not paid, to be compounded, and a mortgage on the land to secure payment of the note; and the plaintiff gave Jenkins his check on a bank in Los Angeles for $1,000, payable to Maria J. Keifer. The mortgage described the mortgagors as "Maria J. Keifer, of Kansas City, Jackson county, state of Kansas, and J. W. Keifer," and both the note and mortgage appeared to have been signed by the two mortgagors. Attached to the mortgage was a certificate of acknowledgment in proper form, made by the defendant A. C. Holmes, who was a notary public in and for the county of Los Angeles, certifying that on the 31st day of December, 1889, "before me * * * personally appeared Maria J. Keifer, wife of J. Keifer, known to me to be the person described in, whose name is subscribed to, and who executed the within and annexed instrument," etc. Attached to the mortgage was also a certificate of acknowledgment, made by another notary public, certifying that on the 2d day of January, 1890, "before me * * * personally appeared J. W. Keifer, (husband of Maria J. Keifer,) known to me to be the person described in and whose name is subscribed to the annexed instrument, and he acknowledged to me that he executed the same." Jenkins presented the check received from the plaintiff to the bank for payment. At the time of the presentation the name "Maria J. Keifer" was indorsed upon the back of the check, and he then also indorsed his own name. The bank paid him the amount called for, and shortly thereafter he disappeared, leaving no property, and his whereabouts was thereafter wholly unknown. The note and mortgage were in fact forgeries. Jenkins was not the agent of Mrs. Keifer for any purpose, and she never authorized him or any one else to negotiate a loan upon the said property. On the 31st day of December, 1889, both Mr. and Mrs. Keifer were in Kansas City, and neither of them ever executed the pretended note or mortgage, or heard of them until some months afterwards, when Mr. Keifer received a letter from Los Angeles, stating that a fraud had been attempted. They were not acquainted with the notaries who certified to the acknowledgments, nad knew no other persons bearing their names. Defendant Holmes was a notary public in December, 1889, and took the acknowledgment purporting to be that of Mrs. Keifer. He did not know anybody by the name of Maria J. Keifer, but he kept a record of all acknowledgments taken by him, and from that and the certificate he knew that some woman must have appeared and been introduced to him as Maria J. Keifer, though he made no entry, and had no recollection as to who the person was who introduced her. Plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant Holmes and the sureties on his official bond to recover damages in the sum of $1,000 and interest thereon from January 2, 1890, and he alleged, among other things, that Holmes, as notary public, "negligently and falsely certified, in the acknowledgment to said forged mortgage, that the person so falsely personating Maria J. Keifer was to him well known to be the said Maria J. Keifer described in said instrument," and that he, "by reason of said acknowledgment and the certifications therein contained, and relying upon the truth of the same, believed the said mortgage to be a genuine and valid instrument and incumbrance upon the real estate therein described, and accepted the same as security for the payment," etc. The defendants, by their answer, denied most of the averments of the complaint. At the trial the plaintiff proved the facts to be substantially as before stated, and rested his case. The defendants then moved for a nonsuit upon the following grounds: "(1) That there was no cause of action made out against the defendants, or either of them. (2) The evidence fails to show that the defendant A. C. Holmes was negligent in taking and making the certificate to the mortgage. (3) That there is no evidence showing or tending to show that the mortgage was not acknowledged before him (Holmes) by one Maria J. Keifer. (4) That the evidence clearly shows that the damage sustained by the plaintiff (if any at all) was not in the act of the notary certifying to the mortgage, or in the fact that the mortgage was forged, if it may be assumed that it was forged, but from the fact that the bank on which he gave the check paid that check under a forged indorsement; and his remedy (if any) is against the bank, and not against the notary." The court granted the motion, and the plaintiff thereupon appealed from the judgment entered against him.

It is clear from the statement of the case which has been made that a scheme was devised to get the plaintiff's money by fraudulent means, and that Jenkins was the active agent in effecting the ends sought to be accomplished. Other parties were engaged with him, but it does not appear who they were. It is also clear that Holmes, as a notary, was guilty of negligence in taking and certifying the acknowledgment of a person whom he did not know, and without any proof by the oath or affirmation of a credible witness that she was the person she pretended to be. The Code provides: "The acknowledgment of an instrument must not be taken unless the officer taking it knows or has satisfactory evidence, on the oath or affirmation of a credible witness, that the person making such acknowledgment is the individual who is described in and who executed the instrument." Civil Code, § 1185. A notary has no right, in disregard of this plain provision of the statute, to certify that he knows a person whom he does not know, on the mere introduction of some third party; and if he does so, and loss results therefrom, he renders himself and his sureties liable to make good the loss. This liability does not, however, extend to a case where the negligence of the losing party is the proximate cause of the loss. Bank v. Murfey, 68 Cal. 455, 9 Pac. Rep. 843; Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 77, 22 Pac. Rep. 979. The questions, then, are: First, did the plaintiff in this case suffer the loss alleged? And, second, if he did, was it proximately caused by his own negligence?

1. The only loss claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff arose from the fact that he delivered his check to Jenkins, and the latter collected and appropriated the money. The check, as before stated, was payable to Mrs. Keifer, and when presented for payment had her name indorsed upon the back of it. The indorsement was a forgery, but the bank, without hesitation or inquiry, so far as appears, paid over the money. The payment was not authorized, and the bank had no right to charge the amount paid against the plaintiff's account. "A forged indorsement passes no title to commercial paper, negotiable only by indorsement; and payment by the drawee, although in good faith, of a draft so indorsed, is no payment at all as to the true owner. Payments made upon forged instruments are, therefore, at the peril of the bank, unless it can claim protection upon some principle of estoppel, or by reason of some negligence chargeable to the depositor. It is the duty of a bank to pay the checks of its customer, drawn payable to order, to the person who becomes holder by a genuine indorsement; and it cannot charge him with payments made otherwise. * * * And where, by the fraud of a third person, a depositor is induced to draw his check payable to a nonexisting person or order, the drawer being in ignorance of the fact, and intending no fraud, the bank on which the check is so drawn has no authority to pay it, and charge the amount to the account of its customer, on the indorsement of the party presenting it, although it appears to have been previously indorsed by the party named as payee. Such indorsement is, in effect, a forgery, and the payment thereon by the bank confers no right on it as against the drawer of the check." Boone, Banking, § 192; and Janin v. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. Rep. 1100. If the above is a correct statement of the law, (and we think it is,) then it follows that the plaintiff had sustained no loss, and was, therefore, not entitled to recover.

2. In view of what has been said, it is unnecessary to consider the second question above propounded. In our opinion, the court was justified in granting the nonsuit upon the fourth ground stated, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

We concur: Temple, C.; VancliEF, C.

PATTY v. COLGAN, State Comptroller. (No. 19,043.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1893.)

Constitutional Law—Legislative Powers—Gifts of Public Money.

Const. art. 4, § 31, provides that the legislature shall have no power to make any gift of any public money. Held, that a legislative appropriation for the benefit of sufferers from the Tia Juana floods was void.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Petition by one Patty for a writ of mandate to E. P. Colgan, as state comptroller. From a judgment granting the writ, the comptroller appeals. Reversed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellant. Johnston & Jones, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an appeal by Hon. E. P. Colgan, state comptroller, from a judgment of the superior court of San Diego county, directing the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate requiring him to draw a warrant in favor of the board of supervisors of San Diego county in the sum of $5,000, for the benefit of the sufferers from the Tia Juana floods of February 22, 1891. The application of the plaintiff and the judgment of the court were based upon the provisions of an act entitled "An act to appropriate the sum of five thousand dollars for the benefit of the sufferers from the Tia Juana floods of the twenty-second of February, 1891, and to provide for the payment to the board of supervisors of San Diego county and its distribution to the sufferers." Section 1 of this act reads as follows: "Section 1. There is appropriated the sum of five thousand dollars out of any moneys in the general fund not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the board of supervisors of San Diego county, to be by said board held in trust and paid out for the benefit of the sufferers from the Tia Juana floods, occurring on the twenty-second day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-one, in San Diego county." The act is clearly in violation of the provisions of section 31, art. 4, of the constitution, which provides that the legislature shall have no power "to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value, to any individual." The object of this provision is well stated in Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 651, 27 Pac. Rep. 1089. An act directing the comptroller to draw his warrant in favor of an individual cannot be impeached by evidence aliunde. Rankin v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 606, 28 Pac. Rep. 673. But here the facts which show the invalidity of the appropriation appear upon the face of the act, and the application ought to have been denied. Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. Rep. 951. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the proceeding, and enter judgment in favor of defendant for costs.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SANTA MONICA v. KOWALSKY et al. (No. 19,049.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1893.)

Presumptions on Appeal—Amendment of Judgment.

1. Where an appeal is taken from a judgment which recites that the motion for judgment was made on affidavit, and the record does not contain the affidavit, the supreme court will presume that it stated facts necessary to justify the judgment.

2. Where an appeal bond is signed by one

Ball as surety, but by a clerical error the judgment is against Bell, and the record shows the error and contains the data necessary to correct it, the error should be corrected by the trial court on motion of any party to the judgment.

Action by the First National Bank of Santa Monica against H. I. Kowalsky. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. An undertaking was filed signed by E. H. Kowalsky and A. Everett Ball as sureties, and from a judgment against them, they appeal. Corrected and affirmed.

T. J. Crowley, for appellants. R. R. Tanner, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On January 26, 1891, the plaintiff obtained a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the defendant H. I. Kowalsky for the sum of $1,284.70, from which he appealed to the supreme court, and to perfect the appeal, and to stay execution of the judgment, filed with the clerk of the superior court an undertaking in the sum of $3,300, signed by appellants E. H. Kowalsky and A. Everett Ball as sureties. The undertaking expressed the conditions prescribed by sections 941 and 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure; among them the condition that, if the sureties did not pay according to the undertaking within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur from the supreme court in the superior court, "judgment might be entered on motion of plaintiff and respondent in plaintiff and respondent's favor against the said E. H. Kowalsky and A. Everatt Bell, the sureties aforesaid, for such amount, together with the interest that may be due thereon, and the damages and costs that might be awarded against the defendant and appellant upon the said appeal." On October 12, 1891, the supreme court dismissed the appeal, (27 Pac. Rep. 783,) and the remittitur was filed in the superior court on November 13, 1891. On January 13, 1892, plaintiff's attorney moved the superior court for judgment against the sureties on said undertaking for the amount of the judgment against H. I. Kowalsky, and judgment was accordingly rendered against E. H. Kowalsky and A. Everett Bell. The judgment thus rendered recited that "this matter came up regularly to be heard on the motion of attorney for plaintiff, the affidavit of E. J. Vawter, the judgment roll in this case, the remittitur of the supreme court filed herein, the notice and undertaking on appeal on file herein, together with all the records and files in this case; and, it satisfactorily appearing to me," (here follows a recital of all the other facts above stated.) No copy of the affidavit of Vawter appears in the transcript, and the omission of it is not accounted for. The sureties, E. H. Kowalsky and A. E. Ball, bring this appeal from the judgment against them upon the judgment roll in the original cause, and the judgment against them, with its recitals, as above stated.

1. Appellants contend that, "before a judgment can be rendered against the sureties on an appeal bond, it is necessary that an affidavit or petition (which fills the place of a complaint in actions generally) should be presented to the court and filed;" and that "there is nothing in the record here to show that the conditions of the obligations had not been fulfilled." Conceding, without deciding, that an affidavit or petition was necessary, the judgment recites that the motion for judgment was made upon the affidavit of Vawter, (who may have been an officer of the corporation plaintiff.) In the absence of that affidavit it must be presumed that it stated all the facts not shown by the other papers and records, upon which the motion appears to have been made, necessary to justify the judgment. Nothing is better settled than that the burden of showing error is upon appellant. The transcript does not purport to contain all the documents or papers upon which the motion was heard. The clerk does not so certify, but only that the documents and papers composing it are full and true copies of originals on file.

2. Appellants make the further point that "the judgment here is not against the sureties, but only against the surety E. H. Kowalsky;" but that "the record shows that the undertaking was given by E. H. Kowalsky and A. Everett Ball," while "the judgment is against Kowalsky and Bell." It is true that the record shows that the undertaking was given by Kowalsky and Ball, and that, by a clerical error in spelling, the judgment is against Kowalsky and Bell; but since the record shows the error, and contains all the means and data necessary to correct it, the error might and should have been corrected, by the court below, on motion of any party to the judgment. Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 495, 27 Pac. Rep. 429. I think the cause should be remanded, with direction to the court below to correct the error in the judgment by substituting therein the name of A. Everett Ball for the name of A. Everett Bell, and also for the name A. Everatt Bell, and that as corrected the judgment be affirmed; and also that appellants pay the costs of appeal.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to correct the error in the judgment by substituting therein the name A. Everett Ball for the name A. Everett Bell and also for the name A. Everatt Bell, and that as corrected the judgment is affirmed; and also that appellants pay the costs of appeal.

TUFFREE v. BROCK et al. (No. 14,882.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1893.)

ACTION TO ESTABLISH A TRUST—FINDING OF FACT—CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

1. Where, in an action to establish a trust in lands, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether or not a certain person, one of defendants, in making a purchase of the lands, was the agent of plaintiff, a finding that he was not such agent will not be disturbed.

2. In such action a witness testified that after the purchase by such defendant the latter said he had paid a certain sum to bind the sale, and asked witness if he and a friend did not wish to take a part in it; that the next day they met at plaintiff's room, and heard that both made a claim to the land, and gave the idea up; that such defendant claimed the property for himself; and that afterwards plaintiff claimed the property. Held, that it was not error to exclude evidence by such witness that he and his friend went to plaintiff's room for the purpose of acquiring an interest in the land from plaintiff on the assumption that he had an interest therein.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by J. K. Tuffree against Alvan D. Brock and others to establish a trust in certain lands to which defendants hold title. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Smith, Winder & Smith, J. W. Swanwick, and A. W. Hutton, for appellant. John D. Bicknell, Brosseau, Hatch & Thomas, H. H. Appel, E. L. Campbell, and King & Saufley, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a decree declaring that the defendant corporations hold the title to certain lands situate in the county of Los Angeles, and frequently spoken of in the record as "Timms' Point," in trust for him. It is alleged in the complaint that on and before June 9, 1887, one A. W. Timms was the owner of the lands in controversy in fee, and that shortly before that day plaintiff was desirous of purchasing the same, and employed as his agent for that purpose the defendant Brock, and advanced the money necessary for his expenses, or otherwise provided therefor, and sent him to San Pedro, the residence of Timms, for the purpose of effecting the purchase; that Brock, as such agent, accordingly entered into negotiations with Timms, and on June 9, 1887, consummated an agreement with him for the purchase of the property for the sum of $25,000,—$100 payable in cash upon the execution of the contract, $9,900 payable on July 9, 1887, at which time the deed was to be executed, and the balance to be secured by two promissory notes for $7,500 each, and a mortgage on the property, both notes bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, compounding semiannually, if not paid, and one payable in one year and the other in two years after the date last mentioned; that Brock, for and on account of plaintiff, and with his moneys, paid to Timms the sum of $100 upon the contract, and though acting as the agent of plaintiff, and making the purchase for and upon his account he took the contract in his own name; that afterwards the defendants Berner, Pearson, Stratton, Weller, and Brock conceived the design of fraudulently obtaining the property under the contract, and repudiating the interest of plaintiff, and in pursuance thereof Brock executed assignments of interests in the contract to Stratton, Weller, and others, but all of their interests were on or before July 9, 1887, vested in Berner, who on that day induced Timms to execute a deed of the lands to him, and to accept his notes and mortgage in pursuance of the contract; that Berner on the same day, for the purported consideration of one dollar, executed a deed of the property to Pearson; that Pearson afterwards executed a deed for an undivided one fifth of it to defendant Lafferty, and that Lafferty subsequently conveyed the said one-fifth interest to the defendant Davis; that on October 20, 1887, Pearson, Davis, and Lafferty executed a deed of all the land to the defendant the San Pedro Harbor Dock & Land Association, and that this association, on April 23, 1888, executed to the defendant the Southern Pacific Railroad Extension Company a deed of two described portions of the land. It is further alleged that at and before the dates of all of the said conveyances the grantees therein had full and actual knowledge and notice of the facts before stated, and of the rights and interests of the plaintiff under the said contract; and also that plaintiff is ready, able, and willing, and offers to pay to the defendants, or such of them as may be entitled thereto, the money paid by them or by Berner as the consideration of a deed to him, and also to pay the amount of money secured by the said notes and mortgage when the same become due. The defendants, by their answers, denied substantially all the averments of the complaint. After trial the court found upon all the issues in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff then moved for a new trial upon a statement of the case, and his motion being denied, appealed from the judgment and order.

The principal contention in support of the appeal is that the finding that Brock, in making the purchase from Timms, was not acting as the agent of plaintiff, was not justified by the evidence. It is admitted, however, that there was evidence directly tending to support this finding and all the other findings, but objected that it was not credible, and therefore ought not to have been believed and acted upon, in view of the stronger and more credible contradictory evidence introduced by the plaintiff. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to say that there appears to have been a substantial conflict in the evidence, and therefore, under the well-settled rule in such cases, the judgment cannot be disturbed on this ground. It is further contended that the court erred in one of its rulings upon the admission of evidence. One George Kerckhoff was called as a witness in rebuttal by plaintiff. He testified that, some days after the bargain with Timms, "Mr. Brock told me that he made a payment of one hundred dollars to bind the sale of the Timms' property, and he asked me and another gentleman, a friend of mine, if we wanted to take part in it. The next morning we had a meeting at Mr. Tuffree's room in the Nadeau House, and then we heard that Mr. Brock made a claim for the property, and Mr. Tuffree made a claim for the property, and I didn't like the aspect of affairs, and we gave it up. We retired. Mr. Brock made a claim for the property for himself alone. * * * Question. I understand you to say that both Brock and Tuffree claimed the property; was that what you said? Answer. No. Peck claimed it for himself alone. Q. Then you say that Tuffree claimed it? A. No. Tuffree claimed the property, but he had not done so before. He claimed the property afterwards,—after we saw him. Q. What did you go to see Mr. Tuffree for?" This last question was objected to by defendants, and counsel for plaintiff then stated: "We anticipate showing by the answers to the question that the parties went there for the purpose of acquiring an interest from Mr. Tuffree, and in pursuance of the assumption upon their part that Mr. Tuffree did have an interest in the matter." The court sustained the objection, and the plaintiff excepted. We are unable to see any error in this ruling. If the witness had testified as counsel anticipated he would, the plaintiff's case would in no way have been strengthened or the defendants' weakened. The anticipated testimony was therefore wholly irrelevant and immaterial. No other points being made for a reversal, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Foote, C.
